TO THE READER.

Rue is that Axiome received from Philosophy, This we observe of interesting is true, i. The conruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the ashes and ruines of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the wosful fall of that one state, axose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their hi-ftory, Titus Livius. For wheras after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Aneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavinum, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Eneid:

Albanique patres, altæmænia Romx:

The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer; as the same Poet writeth a little after:

Hic tamen ille urbem Patav I sedésque locavit Teucrorum, & c.

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, left when Troy was loft, who resting seat did want.

And I wot not well, whither they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Aneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Aneas] unto their lensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, sixteen hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spred still far and neer into all parts of the world. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historians, than either any Monarchy be it never so great, or all those wonderful Pyramides and Obelisks, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty imperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livvius then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the soundation of Rome, with the fractus and Q. Cacinus Metellus Celer were Consuls. He flourished rished all the time of Augustus Casar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtraiet of his visage: whereof the one is represented here, and the other immediatly before the beginning of the Hiltory.

TITVS LIVIVS PATAVINVS,

Cujus invicto calamo, invicta Romanorum facta scripta sunt.

TITE LIVY OF PADVA.

Who wrote long since with peer-less pen, The acts of Romans, match-less men,

To the Reader.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needless it were to call to witness: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchased in stone or cut in brass, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the testimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. A story of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artificiall frame and elegant setting out, comparable to the best in that kind. My purpose is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical discourse of his praises in regard of any gifts of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flourishing in martial puissance, able to fet out and maintain 100000 fighting men for the wars; in stately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and costly buildings; in traffique and frequent assluence of Marchants thither; as also, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and which is not the least, how at this day the famous Vniversity there, affordeth excellent Professors in all kind of learning; nor his happiness and felicity to-live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes those daies of her declining state & deformity, which in great wisdome he foresaw in his spirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the special favour wherein he stood with his Prince Augustus, and Livia the Empress: much less then mean I to set forth the singular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and passing eloquence, which my pen is more able now to describe and amplify to the worthiness therof, than it was to imitate and express the same in translating of his story. Moreover, if I should set into his commendation, befides that I must needs come far short of his merit, the thing it self would but renew the just grief, that all learned men have taken for the pitcous maime and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform complition which he left unto posterity. For having digested the whole history into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collecteth: like as also it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomist, wherof we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 136 and 137: see the partial injury of the time, the crooked and maligne destiny of the man ! Books of far less moment and importance, yea, & those of greater antiquity, have been spared & remain safe : but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not escaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious medling of some busy Aristarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in stead of reforming words, have deformed the natural sense and primitive construction. Where, by the way, I must advertise the Reader of that which Pettus Crinitus hath observed, even against the common opinion proved by those who otherwise are well learned, namely that our Author dispensed not this history into Decades: that is to say futed and forted them not into several Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priscian and other old Grammarians. when they cite any testimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politian do agree. Now in these 35 books, so few as they bespreserved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth, and with such variety, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished with new devises, inventions, and phrases; much like a second Antew, gathering greater strength and more forces still at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which issuing from a small source, is maintained with fresh springs and new riverets: and hasting toward the vast Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader stream. For the form of his stile, I refer the readers to the sound and staid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thueydides, and the best Greeks; than to the fantasticall conceits of some Criticks of our time, who seeking nodum inscirpo, have dreamed of I wot not what Patavinity in him. What should I speak of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that which most of all commendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver with fincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without respect of face or person; to keep only to the substance and train of the subject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, without incerting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much less than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praise the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may feem to gall more bitterly upon a finister affection, glancing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedy defire of gold and idle floath-as not able to endure any long travell, and heat least of all; yet so, as the French, now living, feem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him most friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchised him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Historiographer, I mean the delivery of a simple truth in his narrations; for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearsay any thing that foundeth to an untruth; so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of lier. The wary circumspection of his in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I proposed unto my self in making him English; endeavouring by conference especially of the select copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other translations (such as I had some little skill in) to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A defire I had to perform, in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english History of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affoordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wildome, pollicy, justice, valour, and all vertues whatsoever. According to this purpole and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language; if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obscure and dark; have I not englished every word aptly? Each Nation hath severall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? Censured I look to be and haply reproved; but like as Alcibiades faid to one, warager in & arrow, i.e. Strike bardly (Euribiades) fo you bear me fpeak; even to I say, Find fault and spare not; but withall, read the originall better before ye give sentence. And howsoever i have faulted otherwise by overlight, set against it my affection and desire to do some good whiles I live to my fweet native country; add thereto the long travell that I have taken to testifie the same; and if that will not bring downthe ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you thall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterposse and overweigh my wants, more or less. And thus I recommend unto my countrimen Livy in english habit; Livy (I say) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved arthis day of forrain nations, I cannot easily determine. For like as then (by the testimony of S. Hierom, and Pling in his Epiftles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the fartheft parts of Spain and France, only to fee his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence; even to of late time, his spirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same France and Spain; and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which disfite and remote parts he hath found fuch kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but also with the people in generall; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgeosie) than those seven cities in old timewho every one challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been defirous to cross the seas into this noble Island, not as a traveller to sojourn for a time in the Court only or the Vniversities, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

OF PAD VA, FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE CITY OF ROME.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the First Book.

He comming of Encas into Italy, and his alls there: the reign of Ascanius in Alba: of Sylvius Æneas, and fo forth of other Sylvii, Kings thereof, are contained in the first Book. The daughter of Numitor with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born, Amulius killed The (try of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chosen. He made war Romalus. with the Sabins. He presented unto Jupiter Feretrius the royall spoiles of their King, whom he flow with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanguished the Fidenates and Veientians, and was canonized a god. Numa Pompilius taught the rites and ceremonies of News Pompi Satrifice and divine Service, erected a Temple to Janus, and was the first that shut the doores thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nationsthereabout: and fining that he had secret company and conference by B might with the goddeffe Ageria, wonthe front and fierce hearts of the people to Religion. The execution of Metius Suffetius. Alba rafed and d froyed. The Albans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwelt. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was con-fumed with lightning Ancus Mattius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained it to the Latines, be- Jacu Me ing conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he affigued the mount Aventuacto inhabit. He won again by the force a town of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprised and possessed themselves of and utterly destroyed it. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjoyned to the City the bill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, built Offia, and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his raign, Lucumo the fon of Demaratus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquins, a City of Tulcane, and came to Rome: and there entring into amity with Ancus, legan to bear the name of Tarqui-nius, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the Kingdom upor him. He encreased the number of the Senators by one hundred subdued the Latines, appointed the Circus or Theater, set forth the publike games and plaies: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the horsemen. And for to make proofe and triall of Accius Navius the Augur his cunning, he dema ided of him, as they Jay, whether that which he conceived in his mind were possible to be effected: and when he made answer, that it was, be commanded him to cut a whetstone in two with a razor, which out of hand was by Accius done. Moreover, he wan the field of the Sabines, and defeated them, walled the City about, made the vaulted finks and when he had raigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the sons of Ancus, There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the fon of a Captive, a noble Lady of Corniculum, who being a child, and lying fread-service Tolki

Defin the cradle, had a flame of fire (as the report goath) burning about his head. He discomfited the Veten-tes and Tuscanes in battell: He was the first than numbred the people of Rome, valued their goods and influnted the Lustrum every sweyears, in which were reputed to have been numbred eighty thousand Citizens. He described the Classes and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomerie, without and within the City walt; and put to the City the hils Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Elquilinus. He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had raigned four and thirty years, he was, with the privity, and by the counfell of his daing her Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the son of Pricus, Affer him L. Tarquinius Superbus usured the Kingdom, without the election, either of the Se-Sa nators or the people On which day Tullia (most wicked and cursed wretch that she was) caused ter Coach to be driven over the Corps of her father. Ifing dead on the ground, He had about him a troup of arm d men for the guard of his person. By a subtile wile he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He had war with the E orthe guara of this person. Di a juoine more to partie on the hill Capitoll where the god Terminus and goddeffe Juventas, agreed not to be difplaced, who fe altars could not be stirred nor removed, as the others. By the freedulent prollife of his fon Sex Tarquinius he brought the Gabians to his oberfance. Unto his other H two smt, sheing gone to Delphi, and consisting there the Oracle, whether of them should be King of Rome, is fiver was n. adc. That he should reign who first kiffed his mother : which answer they interpreting wrong, Junius Brutus, who accompanied them in ther voyage, made at though he cought a fall, and tiffed the ground, the mother indeed of all: which proved true on his part as it fell out in the end. For when as Tarquinius Superbus by his proud tyrannic. Il demeanour, had incurred the hatred of all men: he at less upon the foreibte overage and willow done by Sex, Tarquinius (his son) in the might leason spon the body of the Citia subo fending for her f. ther Tricipitinus, and her hust and Collatinus, before the cornession of the consequence of the conseq to f. e her death unrevenged, and fo with a knife killed her felfe : he, I fay, by the means of Bruus, effecialto he ener mean narroung ungang many man and the mean and the state of the mean to be dead in the direct of the field ont of Rome, when he had rainford five and twenty years. Then were the Confule I first coured, bu, Jun, Brutus, and Lu, Tarquinius Collatinus,

The Preface of Titus Livius to bis whole Work.

Hether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first Foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my travail, Leither wot I well, nor if I wift, dare I avouch : feeing it is a thing both old and usuall, that new Writers alwaies perswade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the rudenesse of elder time, How-K foever itial out, this yet will do me good, that even I alfo. to the utmost of my power, have endea-voiced to eternize the worthy deeds of that people which is the foveraign of the whole world. And if, among fo many Writers, my fame chance to be oblcure, yet may I comfort my felfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the same, are men so highly reputed and renowned. Befides, the thing it self is of infinite toile and labour, as counting and comprizing from above 700 years paft, and which ariting from finall, beginning hath proceeded and grown for great, as now the bignefit thereof is combrous to it felt; and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but finall delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times next ensuing, for haste they make to these novelties of later daies, wherein the puissance of that so mighty people hath wrought long firee their own downfalland overthrow. But I contrariwie will feek even this for L guerdon of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding theic calamities, which this our Age for many years hath feen, to long at least : whilest I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my fpirits in considering those ancient monuments of old time exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to withdraw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavy. As aue, it not to without my more as a trick from the Foundation of the City, more beautified and for our with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithfull Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and priviledge hath antiquity, by interlacing the acts of gods and mentogether, to make the first rising of Cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for any people under heaven to confectate and ascribe unto the gods their Originall, surely, such is the renowned martiall prowess of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to M report Mars above the reft, to be the prime father both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But these and such like matters, how soever they shall hereafter be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard, This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was atchieved and enlarged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behaviour and manners sunk withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruin yea, and began foon after to tumble down right even untill these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own fores, nor salves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an hillory, when a man may fee and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and lightsom memorial N the lively examples of all forts, fet up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himself and his Country what to follow, as also learn how to eschew a foul enterprise and avoid a fhamefullend. But unleffe I be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commenced work, never was there Common-weal, either more mighty, more holy, and devout, better flored of good presidents, or into which coverousnesse and excesse more lately crept, or wherein poverty and frugality were in greatly or fo long time honoured, infomuch as the more they wanted, the leffe they defired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in avarice abundant pleafures have kindled a defire by riot luft, and loofe life, to deftroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (how soever we do) at our first entrance of so weighty a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poetsuse, it o were our manner also) with good presages and lucky forespeakings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesses, to vouchiase their surtherance and happy successe to the enterprise of so great a

The First Book

TUS LIVI

Int of all this is generally held for certain, That the Greeks, after the winning of Troy, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, fave only Ruess and Amenor: to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutuall entertainment, as also for that they ever perswaded peace and the rendring again of Hilen, they wholly forbare to shew any rigour at all, as by martial right of war they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetians, who driven by civill discord out of Papilagonia, and having lost ven at Troy their King Pylemenes, were to feek both a resting place, and a Captain founded from to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of the fortune and the for B the Adriatick sea: and after they had expelled the Euganians that inhabited between the sea and the Alps, those Henerians together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniory thereabout was also named de Troy, and the whole people in generalicalied Henetians. Moreover, how Eneas upon like misfortine, having fled his countrey, yet appring by the fatall direction of the deflinies to greater affairs, came first into Macedony: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and failing with a sleet from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewise was termed Troy. Where the Trojans being fet a shore having after their long wandring nothing in a manner left them but ships and armour, as they forraged and drave booties out of the Countrey, the King Latinus with the riborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike man-King La C ner out of town and countrey, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what beiell thereupon, is two manner of waies reported. Some lay, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first made peace with Eneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies flood ranged in battell array, before the trumpets lounded the battell, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generall of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chancethey departed from their own home, and to what endthey entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Capenda tain Eneas, fon of Venus and Anchifes, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forgone their countrey, fought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondred much, not only at the noblenesse of the people and their leader, but also at their couragious hearts, resolved either for war D or peace: whereupon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each hold faluted other. And Atment was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court, Where Latinus folemnly in presence of his fawas by Lauring entertained and louged in the Court. Where Latring foreintly in presence of its 12- sound in the militar houshold gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Enous, joyned private alliance to the fish Le former publike confederacy. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope and full affurance to end one day their wandring and flitting to and fro, and to fettle themselves in one certain place of abode. Hereupon, a Town they built, which Enous of his wives name called Lavinium. Within a Leving while built is now marriage he had diffuse four whom the property of the control of the same present he had diffuse four whom the property of the same present and the same present the same property and the same present the same property of the same present the same presen while, by this new marriage, he had iffue a fon: whom the parents named Afcanius. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warred upon. For Turnus King of the Rutilians, unto be whom Lavinia, before Aneas his coming, had been espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was E preferred beforehim, made war both upon Ancas and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the

Then Turnus and the Rutilians mittrufting Latinus and the Rutilians their ownstrength, sled for succourto the puissant and mighty Tuscans, and to their King Mezentins, who keeping his Royall Court at Cere, a town in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City, and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the safety of the borderers, joyned full willingly his forces with the Rutilians, Eneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against fo dreadfull and dangerous war, to the end they all should not only live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. Now was not Afcanies, Encas his son, ripe as yet for age to fway the Scepter, Howbeitthe Royall Crown remained whole and fale for him, untill hecame to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grandfre and father descended, unto the childs behoof, under the government only of a woman, as Proteetrefle: of lo vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia, Doubtfull much Island (for who can certainly avonch a thing (o long ago?) whether this wege that Afcanizator one elder I than he, who had to his mother Creale, while I limn flourished, and who fied with his father from I there and seem whom being named also Julus, the honse and samily of the Julus do feeth their name The family of and pedigree. That fame Afcanius, wherefoever, or of whomfoever he was born; (but Aneas his fon of a truth he was) when Lavinium grew exceeding populous, left that City now flourithing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or depmother, I wot not whether. He himself built another out of the ground under the mountain Albe, which of the feituation thereof, stretching our in length on the fide of the hill, was named Long Alba. Between the building of Lavinium and Long Alba, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. Burfo mighty grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tustans, that neither upon the death of Eneas, nor during the time of a womans government, nor K all the while that the young Princelearned to be a King, durst either Mezentins, or the Tulcans, or any other of the borderers once flir or rifein arms. But peace was concluded upon these termes, That the river Albula, which now they call Tybris, should divide the Tuscans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this raigned Sylvius, the fon of Afcanius, born by chance within the forrests: who begat Encas Sylvius, and he had iffue Latinus Sylvius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships erected, and the inhabitants named Pristi Latini, And from thenceforth all the Kings of Alba continued the firmame of Sylvius. This Latinus begat Alla, of Alba came Atts, Atts begat Cepts, and of C pu descended Capetus; whole fon Therman in trying over the river Albala was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him raigned Agripps his son, and after him in ceeded Romulus Sylvius in his fathers King- 1 dom, who being firucken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Aventinus. This Aventinu was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then raigned Procas, who had two tons, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father or the reverend regard of elder brother, For Amulius having driven out Numiter, raigneth himselfe: and not herewith content, heapeth one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brothers daughter a Vestall Nun and that under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetuall vowed virginity, he bereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a farall thing, and (as I think) which God would have, that so great a City should be built for to yeeld the ground and beginning M of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestall Virgin was by force defloared, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that the thought so in very deed, or because the name and credit of a god might carry away and cloake the sault more cleanly, she sathered her bastard children upon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to save herself or her children from the Kings cruelty. For the Votary was committed to close prison, and there kept bound in irons: as for the babes he commanded they should be cast into the stream of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tyber overflowed the banks, and the standing waters on either side was nothing rough, yet fo, as there was no coming to the deep current or channell of the very river: and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were it never so still and low. So to sulfill after a fort the Kings commandement, they laid the children N in the next plash they came to: even whereas now standeth the fig-tree Ruminalis, called, as they fay, Romularis: but all that ground then was nothing but waste deserts, and a very wildernesse. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, and had left on dry ground the floating trough or vessell, wherein the babes were put forth, a she-Wolffrom out of the mountains thereby, being athirst turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats so gently gave the infants luck, that Faustulus the head Reeve and overseer of the Kings Cattell found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestall, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that think, that Laurentia being a common strumpet among these heardmen and shepherds, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Weil, so were they born and so brought up. And as soon as they grew once to some big- O nesse, it was no boot to keep them within doores, nor to fet them idly to tend the cattell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the forrest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage withall, they were able now, not only to withfland the violence of wild beafts, and to kill them, but also to fet upon common robbers by the high-waies fide, laden as they were with booties, and to spoile them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherds, and as the number of younkers dayly encreased with them to keep holidaies, to make merry, and follow their disports. And even in those

A daies (as mentay) was the fettivall pattime Lapercal, used in mount Palarine, which of Palanteum, Lapercal, a City in Arcadia, was first called Pelantism, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who deficended Evander from the Arcadians, long before reigned in that country, and ordained a folemngame and recreation yearly to be held, as aforetime in Arcadia, in this manner: that youngmen in the honor of P.in Ton Licent Lyceus, whom the Romans after called Innus, should loofely and wantonly run naked. Now whilest or tame. they were builty occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearly they performed; there lay in ambuilt the robbers aforefaid, in revenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lott: Where amount the roll of this first they took priloner: and being thus taken, they brought Roma taken him before King Amulius, accusing him grievously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with pitches B others invaded and made rodes into Numitor his Land, and with a power of lufty youths, affembled in warlike fort, had fortaged and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to be putto death, Now had Faufulus even fin. e the first day conceived fome hope, that there were in his housefoster children of royal bloud: For well he wift, that both by the Kings commandment the babes were call forth to perith, and also that the time when he took them up fell out firly thereunto: mary this would he in no wife should be known in haste, and before due time; unlesse it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessity happed first: and so for very sear he was driven to reveal the whole matter to Romalus. It hapned also, that Numitor himself having Romas in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and viewing with all their very countenance and towardness proceeding from no servile and base parentage, bethought himself of his C fifters children: and by farther enquiry and computation came to far, as he seemed well-near to acknowledge Remus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and surprize King Annulius. For Rosculus on the one fide not accompanied with a troup of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good : but giving the herdmen his affiftants, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he set upon the King. On the other fide, Remus with another cruefrom Numitor his houle, came to fecond him: and to they flew the Kirg. Numitor at the first uproregiving out efticons, that the enemies had entred the City, and affailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keep it by torce with a good guard, and elpying the two young men after the mirder done, comming towards him with joy: forthwith aftembled the people together, and declared o-D penly before them all the wiked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his Nephews. the manner of their birth and bringing up, and how they came to be known: after that he reported the murder of the Tyrint, and took it upon himself as the author thereof. The two young men palfing with their companies through the midft of the people, faluted their grandfire King, whereat the whole multitude allo with one accord and voice ratified the same: so was his royall name and estate by them established. Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Albans committed to Nu. Namites King mitter. Then Romilus and Remus had a great delire to found themselves a City in the very place where mitor. Then Romalus and Romas had a great dehre to found themtelves a City in the very place where they had been calt forth and follered. Now were there of Albans and Latines both, very many and tome and tome they had been calt forth and follered. that might be spared; besides, a number of herdmen: who all set together, put the ningood hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a E building. Romalus chose the mount Polatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one apartto receive their Augury. First (as they say) had Augury Remus appearing in flight fix vultures or gripes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augury it hapned that the number unto Romalus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by

Thus they fell to hot words first, and from cholerick words to blows and bloudfhed: in which flir and preis of the people, Remus was wounded and flainin the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in fcorn of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler flue his brother with his own hands, and in menacing wife, added these words withall, So perish he, whatever else he be, that shall once dare to leap over my walls. had driven the beafts into his own cave, the very tracks would have led the owner of them thither, H he drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tails into his hole. Hercules early in the morning when he awoke, and beheld his drove, and missed some of his count, went on towards the next cave, it haply their footing would traine him thither: But feeing all traces fromwards, and leading no other way; as one troubled in spirit, and doubtfull what to do, he began to drive farther out of that theevifh and dangerous corner. But as some of the Oxen in driving, milled their fellows behind and honing after them, bellowed as their nature is: Hercules chanced to heare them low again, and answer from out of the cave wherein they had been bestowed: whereat he turned back, and made hafte thirher. But as Cacus forcibly made head against him, and would have kept him from entrance. Hercules fmote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other herdmen for helpsflew I him outright. At the lame time Evander, who fled out of Peloponnefus, governed that Countrey, rather by a kind of countenance and authority, than by force and Lordly command. A man much honored for his wonderfull invention of Letters, a strange and rarething among those rude and unlearletters and lost: but more honored for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmenta, reputed to be a goddesse, whom for her spirit of prophese, those countries, before that Sy. illa came into Italy, had in great reverence and admiration. This Evander being raised with the concourse of the shepherds, affrighted about the stranger, guilty of manifest murder, and hearing of the fact committed, and the occasion thereof: viewing well therewith the perion of the man, his feature and favour, more flately a good deal, and carrying a greater Majesty than the ordinary proportion of men; demandeth of him who he was. And as foon as he underflood his name, his father, and native Coun-K try: O Hercules (quoth he) the fon of Jupiter, All hail: my mother a most true Prophetes hath foreshewed unto me, that thou shalt encrease the number of heavenly wights, and that in this place an Altar shall be reared and dedicated unto thee, which the most mighty and richest nation one day of the world shall name Maxima, and honour according to the ceremonies by thee ordained. In a good hour be it ipoken (quoth Hexculer) and the prelage 1 gladly accept: and fo giving him his hand, faithfully promiled to accomplish the will of the gods, and exceed it raightwaies and conferrated an Altar in the place. There and then first, he sacrificed one of the fairest Oxen, chosen out of the whole drove, calling to the ministry of that divine service and seast the Potitii and Pinarii, two most noble arove, caning to the ministry of that divised to, by chance, that the Poisis were ready at hand in due time, and the inwards or intrals were let before them: which being eaten, the Pimaris came to the L good chear behind: whereupon the custome heid that so long as the family of the Pinarii continued they might not feed of the facred inwards. But the Potitis, infiructed by Evander, became the Priefts of that holy facrifice many ages after: untill the folemn service and ministery of this family was put over to publike servants, and the whole tock of the Pointii utterly worn out and dead. These were the only for ain factifices of all other, that Romulus received and admitted, being even then a furtherer and maintainer of immortality, by his own prowess atchieved, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods. he assembled the multitude to an audience : and for that they could by no means but by Laws be

So began first the City according to the plot of large buildings, to be well peopled and grow mighty. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought then upon a Councell and policy to his power. And lo created a hundred Senators: either because that number seemed great enough, or for that there were no more but one hundred that were of worth to be elected counsellors or (wife) fathers. These men certainly for honor and dignity were called Patres or Sage fathers: and their lineall descent Patritii or Nobles. Now by this time was the State of Rome so mighty and tendance of twelve Officers and Sergeants, called Littores, whom he caused to go ordinarily before his person, Some think he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augury did foreshew and prognosticate his raign: I rather am of their opinion, who think that Sergeants at Arms, and this kind of Officers came from the Tuscans their neighbours, from whence also the Ivory chair of estate. called Sella curulis, and the Royall purple robe embroidered, named Toga pratexta, was fetched, as also the very number of Serjeants or Lictors. For that the Tuscans had this manner, when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principall States, each one found warks. as men fill built in fundry places where they liked best, ieeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Fur hermore, lest that the City, so large in compasse, should stand void and vacant, Romulus for to en rease the number of the inhabitants (according to the old practife of the founders of Cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obcure, segmed that they were an off-spring born out of the earth) set up a Sanctuary, or lawlesse Church, called Afylum, in that place which at this day between the two groves, is enclosed and fenced round about with thick briers and brambles. Thither reforted (as to a place of refuge) out of the neighbor Countries, a rabble and confused medley of all forts, tag and rag, bond and free, one with another; folk defirous of change and a Sergeant. All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bul- N

puiffant, that it was able in fight to match any City neer adjoining what foever. But for default of woman kind, this puissance was to endure but the age of one man: for neither had they hope of iffue among themselves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbors abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the advise of his Senators, fent Embassadors to the countries thereabout, to treat for fociety and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alledging that Cities alio, as well as The Embal. fociety and alliance for his new people, by way of maninger. Howbeit, this embassage in no place had gentle audience and courteous entertainment. For they all in general despised them, and were in tear for themselves and their posterity, by reason of so mighty a state, encreasing in the midit of them, and under their very noies. And from the most of them the Embassadors were dismissed and sens away, with this fromp and demand, Whether they had fer up a Sanctuary or lawleis place for women too? For that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to fort together. This took the youth of Rome in great displeasure, and doubtlesse the quarrel grew like to be tried by knocks. But Romulus diffembling his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpole, prepareth to let forth certain tolemn playes and games, which he nameth Confualia, to the honor of Neptune Equestris. Hereupon he commanded to pro-C clame these games all over the country adjoining; and with as great preparation and lumiture, as in the sam in those days either their skill or ability might afford, they celebrate the same, and all to make the shew more goodly, and worthy to great expectation. Thither reforted many a one, defirous also to fee this new City, but their next neighbors especially of Cenina, Crastuminum, and Antenna: The whole multitude of Sabins likewife came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to their houses from one to another, and courteously entertained: when they beheld the fituation of the City, the firong walls and fair buildings, so thick standing wondred how in so short a space the City of Rome was grown to great. Now when the time of this solemn fight was come, and that their minds were builed, and their eyes bent thereon; then at once, as it was agreed before, there arose an uproar. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell one- The Sabin D very fide to carry away the Sabin Maidens. A great many of them were ravished by hap hazzard, as wifed they did light upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other some more beautiful then the reft, were appointed for the chief of the Senators, and by certain of the Commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houses. But one passing fair and lovely above allothers, was hurried by the company of crue of one Tal. ssius (they tay) and when as any asked to whom they carried her, they ever cried out (forfear she should beforced or deflowred) Thataffio, Thataffio, i.e. Unto Thalassim. Whereupon Thalassio became a common by word at Weddings ever after. Thus their sport and passime upon this stir and fright, was marred, and the Parents of the Virgins fled away with heavy cheer, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hospitality: and calling upon the god for vengeance, to whole festival games they being come, were under colour E of religion and truth, beguiled. The Damlels likewile that were ravished, conceived neither better hope of themselves, nor less indignation against them. But Romulus himself in person went from one to another, declaring, "That their fathers pride, wno denied their neighbors marriage was the ec cause of all this, promising nevertheless that they should be linked in lawful wedlock, made par-vished. er takers of all worldly goods, obtain the freedom of a City, and (then, which nothing is more deer to "mankind) enjoy the bleffing of children: exhorting them to appeale their anger, and quiet them-"felves, and to give them their hearts, whose hap it was to have their bodies. Their husbands withal used fair speeches, and flattering words, excusing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure love: which kind of perswasion of all other, prevaileth most with womens nature, Thus were the ravished young Wives in some sort quieted in mind, and held themselves well contented. But their fathers then most of all arayed in mourning weed, with tears and heavy complaints, flirred up the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained they their mood withinhome, but assembled themselves from all parts unto Tatius the King of the Sabius: and to him repaired their Embaffages, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in those countries. They of the Sabi of Cenina, Crustuminum, and Antenna, who were partly touched and grieved for that wrong done,

This is the very beginning of that Temple, which first of all other was in Rome consecrated. And so it pleased God, that neither the first founders words were spoken in vain, whereby he foretold and pronounced, that his posterity should bring their spoils thither: nor his glory made vulgar and common to many co-partners with him in the like exploit and glorious present. For after him, in so many years, and after so many wars, two royal spoils only were won of the enemies. So rare was the happiness of honor in that behalf. Whilst the Romans were thus employed about Cenina, the army of the Antennates, taking the vantage of time and of the Romans abience from home, and feeing their frontiers without a guard, with a power of armed men entred the confines of Rome. Again whom also the Roman Legion made head in all hatte, and finding them feattered out of order in the fields, charged upon them. By reason K whereof, at the very first shock and shout made discomfitted were the enemies and their town surprized. As Romulus returned with triumph and joy for these two victories, his Wife Hersilia, at the importunate fute of the Wives that had been ravished, earnestly belought him to pardon their fathers, and receive them into his City: for so by concord and unity the Weale-publick, and the "good effate of his Kingdom might flourish and grow mighty. This sute was gently heard, and foon obtained. After this, he let forth against the Crustuminians that began to war upon him: with whom he had the less ado, for that their courages were well abated already by the overthrows of others. To both these places as unto Colonies, were new inhabitants sent But the greater numthe Romans ber were defirous to enter their names, and to plant themselves at Crustuminum, for the fertility of the foil. And many likewise removed from thence to Rome, the parents especially and kinsfolk of L the ravished women. Last of all, the Sabins warred far more sharply and dangerously then the rest, for nothing did they either in sury and rage, or for covetous desire of spoil. Neither made they talk and thew of war, before they warred indeed and were seen in field. And besides this their coninteract point y, they desit and with trait and libitity. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeins had thecharge of gentue of the Calife in Rome, his daughter a young maiden, Tatint with a firm of money corrupted and profiderate policy, they dealt also with crast and subtilty. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeius had the charge cured at what time as the went to fetch water without the walls for facrifice, to receive armed fouldiers into the fortress. But to loon as they were let in, they with their armor smothered and killed her: eitherfor that thereby it might be thought the Castle was won by force: or because they would make her an examp'e to posterity, that no Traitor should ever think to escape unpunished. But hereto belongeth a tale, namely, that the Sabins used commonly on their left arms to wear M br celets of maffie and weighty gold, and fair rings belides on their fipgers, fet with precious stones of great value : and that she covenanted and agreed with them to have that which they wear on their left hands, whereupon she had their targets in stead of those golden ornaments, heaped upon her. Others fay, that upon agreement and covenant made to deliver that which was on their left hands. The demanded their armor and because the seemed to deal deceitfully, the was overtaken therewith, and perished by receiving a reward of her own chusing. However it was, the Sabins were possessed of the Castle. From whence the morrow after (when as the Romans army well appointed in battel ray, had taken up and overspread the whole plain that lieth from mount Palatine to the hil Capitol) they would not come down on even ground before that the Romans partly netled with anger, and partly pricked with an hot defire to recover the Cassle again, began with their N great disadvantage to climb against the hill. Whereupon the Captains on both sides joined battel. Metius Curtin for the Sabins. Hofting Hoft line for the Romans : who abeit he was on the lower ground, yet in the forefront most couragiously and stoutly underwent the brunt of the conflist. Butfo foon as he was firucken down and flain, incontinently the Romans retired and gave ground : and thus discomfitted fled backward to the old gate of Palatium. Romulus himself also, born back with the press and throng of those that fled, lift up his weapons on high towards heaven, and cried out faying: "O Jupiter, I Romulus by thy direction guided and ruled, have here in this mount Pala-"tine laid the foundation of this City; and now already have the Sabins by corruption and treacheto land see "ry got the Citadel and fortress thereof: from whence they having passed the midst of the vale be-"tween, make hither in halle with force of arms: But thou O father of gods and men, vouchfafe O "yet from hence at least wise to repulse the enemies, deliver the Romans from this so great fear, and "flay their shameful flight. And here to thee O Jupiter Stator I vow a Temple, for a memorial to "all posterity, that by thy present help this City was faved and preserved. Thus having once prayed, as if he had kn wn for certain that his prayers were heard. Even here (quoth he) O ye Romans doth Jupiter Opt. made a fland. And Romalus in person hyed him with all speed to the formost in the vanguard Now was Metius Cureius, principal leader of the Sibins, run down from the Caffle, and had feattered and chased the Romans back as far as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day reacheth in length : and being come within a little of the gate of Palatinm, he lift up his voice and cried aloud : "Vanquisht we have these faithless friends, and heartless foes: and now know they well, it is one " thing to ravish maidens, and a far other thing to fight with men. In this fort, as he braved it out. Romilus with a troop of lufty young men, made head against him, Metias haply at that time fought on Horieback, whereby he was forced the foomer to recule, and the Romans made after and purfued him. The other battel of the Romans in like manner, being much encouraged with the valour B of their King, discomfited the Sabins. Metius with his horse under him, affrighted at the noise of them that ran after, leapt into a marish or bog thereby. Which accident, considering the danger of To great a perion, made the Sabins to look back to him. And he verily taking heart again at the calling and encouragement of many of his favourites, elcaped. But the Romans and Sabins both, in the middle valley between the two hills, renew the battel again: where the Romans porthe better hand. Then the Sabine Dames, for whole wrongtol utage all this war arole, with their hair hanging loose about their shoulders, and renting their garments, for very stief and sorrow past all fear, ventured to run amongst the javelins and darts as they flew: and thus having thrust themselves violently overthwart between them, began to part these bloody armies, and to end their deadly send : Befeeching their own fathers on the one fide, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers C and fons in law, would not embrew themselves with so unkind and unnatural bloodshed, nor as parricides, murder the young ones newly born, some their grand-children, and others their own heirs heir, of their body begotten. "If ye our fathers, think much (lay they) of the affinity between our hus-" bands and you, or if ye our husbands are displeased with our marriage, bend all your anger and "malice against us: we are the cause of this war, we are the cause of wounding and killing both er husband and father: yet will we rather die then live either Orphans without the one, or Widows er without the other. This thing moved as well the multitude of Souldiers, as also the Captains; and prefently of a fudden all was huflit, and the fight ceased. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a League. Neither made they peace only, but one City of two: united their Realms, and joined together in the Regiment : but the royal estate they setled in Rome. of Cures, a town of the Sabins, called Quirnes. And for a memorial of that battel, the very place Quint

D The City thus being made one of twain, the Romans for to gratifie the Sabins in some fort, were where Curtius, after he was gotten out of the deed marish, first set his horse on firm ground, was mamed Curring his lake. This joyous peace enfuing prefently upon fo cruel wer, made these women Curine Lawn better be loved of their husbands and parents: but especially of Romelus himself. And therfore when Curin. 30. he divided the City into thirty Wards or Parishes, he called them by their names. But it is not left in any record (for out of all question the women were far more in number then to) whether those that should give names unto the Wards, were chosen by age, or by their own dignity and worthinels, or their husbands degree and calling, or by casting lots. At the same time were enrolled and ordained three Centuries of Gentlemen or Knights: The Ramnenses were so called of Romalus, the E Titienses of Titus Tatius; but of the name and first beginning of the Lucerians, the occasion is not tertain. So their two Kings not only raigned together, but also governed with great unity and concord. But after certain years the kinged of King Taring chanced to beat and evil entreat the Embaffadors of Laurentum. And when as the Laurentines pleaded thelaw of Nations, for fatisfaction of this outrage; Tatius his kinsfolk what by favour, and what by intreaty, prevailed more with him then the just complaint of the others. Whereby he brought vengeance due to them upon his own head: for being come upon a time to Lavinium, unto a folemn facrifice and feast, there in an uproar or hurliburly the people ran upon him, and so was hessain. Which thing (they say) Romalus made less regard of then was meet: either for that fellowship in Lordship is never saithful, or because he esteemed him not unjustly to be made away. Whereupon he forbare indeed to make war: yet to E the end the wrong done unto the Embaffadors, together with the murder of the King, might be expiate and purged clean away, the League between the Cities of Rome and Levinium was renewed. But whilft peace verily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded: behold another fresh war arole, much neerer then the other, and hard almost at their very gates. For the people of Fidene supposing the Romans power and riches to encrease over much so neer unto them; before they should grow to such greatness as they were like to do, began first to war upon them: and sending a power of lufty tall fouldiers, invaded and wasted all the country between the City of Rome and Fidene. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tyber kept from the other, they forraged and spoiled as they west, to the great sear of the Peasants and country people. So as this student turnult and garboil heard out of the fields into the City, brought the first news of the war, Ramulus C raised therewith (for no sigh a warmight bear no delay) led forth his army, and encamped within a mile of Fidum: and leaving there a competent guard, he departed thence with all his other forces; commanding part of his fouldiers to lie close in certain covert places, among the thickets in ambushment. Himself with the greater number, and all his horse, advanced forward, and riding up and of the most of the second down before their gates after a difordered and bragging manner, made temblant of a bravado, and all to train the enemy forth, which was the thing he only fought. This kind of horse fervice was a means that the Fidenates less suspected and marvelled at their flying, which they were to counter-troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor fiding from any one person in particular : for that in a State so newly risen, and of so small continuance, there was feit, For whilst the Cavalry stood unresolved, as it were, in a mammering whether to fly or fight, G and the Infantry withal began to retire : all at once the enemies in throngingmanner fallied forth of the gates, and chased the Romans to fiercely, that in their eager puriout they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Thencethe Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flanck of the enemies; And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were lest behind to guard the camp, shewed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified fundry ways, before well neer that Romalis and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rodefull gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that purfued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy : for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pel-mel into the town, before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chaie. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tuscans. And fearing lest (if the Roman forces should thus diffress and lie upon all the borderers) they being so neer should not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entred in arms the confines of Rame. spoiling and rifling, more like robbers then professed warriers. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Veii. The Romans contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battel, and to hazzard all, passed over the Tyber. Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: issued I forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of word, and in open field, rather then to be mued up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls. There the Roman King with the firength only of his old beaten fouldiers, without any other help and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chased them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding strong, fortified as well by natural fituation, as by walls, he forbare to affault it. But in his return homeward, he wasted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil, With this defeature the Veientians no less subdued then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to lofe part of their lands. These were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfires Kingdom: his policy and wisdom infounding the City first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whose good proceedings it got fuch strength, and to sure footing, that for forty years space after, it enjoyed peace with safety. Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers most heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Esquires of the body, three hundred Penhoners armed, not only in time of war, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres, Thus having atchieved these noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time affembled all his people upon the plain, at the marish Capra, there to number or muster his army behold upon a sudden there arose a tempest with great cracks of thunder, which with so thick and cloudy a storm, covered the King, that the people loft the fight of him. And never after was Romalus feen on earth. The Roman youth, after their fear was at length past, and that upon to dark and troublesome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withal, feeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that flood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the florm: yet firucken into fad dumps, as it were for the loss of their father, held their peace a good while, But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hait god Romulus the son of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earnest prayer beleeching him of his grace, that he would vouchfafe to be propitious, and fave their off-fpring and pofferity for ever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised that the King was M pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumor also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure tearms. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the present sear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more currant. Over and befides, it grew the rather credible, through the politick practife of one person. For as the whole City was pensive and sorrowful for the mifs of their King, and fore displeased with the Senators, one Proculus Julius, a sub-forming from the mine of the men (a) and to be believed in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assembly. "Romnius (quoth he) O Quirnes, the Founder and Patron of this City, even "this very morning at the day break, descended inddenly down from heaven and met me, and as one person in particular, one one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two feveral factions in general. For they that were deficended of the Sabins, fearing left because after the death Roman and Ro factions in general, 101 title, many factions in general purification, they salous for of Tatins there was none of their part, that had raigned with Romanian in equal jurisdiction, they salous for the County was defined to be a fact of the charge of the should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King choich out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or forraigner to be King, Howbeit, thus diverily affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wor) B had not yet tasted the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear lest perad enture in case the hearts of many Cities thereabours, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some forraign power would make invasion, finding the City without government. and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators aflociate and combine together in the rule of the Common-weale, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and for every Decury chusing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Enigns and the Lictors before him. This loveraignty and preheminence determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manners they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at C this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their servitude was greater then before, having now Lords over them, an hundred for one : and seemed they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own chung. The Senators feeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to offerthat of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forgo, curried favour with them in this wife, to wit by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chung a King) yet fo, as they gave them no greater priviledg, then they refer ed to themselves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it should stand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave thereto their Toyal affent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chufing of Magiltrates or Rulers, the fame right is in some fort observed, setting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the peo-D ple give their voices, the Senators palle by their authority, that which they would have done, fall it out in the affembly of people, by icrutiny, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Intefregent having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quiries, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect, or nominate yea flew King: for so is the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality as may be deemed worthy to fucceed Romulus, then will they by their affent pass the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not seem behind in bounty and courtefie, they answered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in those days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religious: he dwelt in Cures, a City of the Sabins E a man right skilful and very well seen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whole teacher and first matter, for want of other Author of his Science and Knowledge (they say) but yet untruely, was Pythagoras of Sames. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100, years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples, and followed his Sect. in the utmost and farthest coult of Italy, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeithe had lived in that time) whatfame of him could foread to far as to the Sabins ? or by what entercourse and affinity of language might hepofibly have trained any man unto him for defire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help: could Nama travelalone unto him in safety, through so many countries, of divers tongues and fundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature r was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not so much in strange and forraign Sciences, as after that strict rule, that stern and severe discipline of the ancient Sabins; then whom, there was not a nation in times past, more precise, reformed, and void of corruption. The Roman Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they faw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chung their King from among them, yet was there none of them to audacious, as to preier either themselves, or any one of their party and faction, not any one, I say, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but a lingeheral with one accord, agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pomp lins. Who being fent for and come; like as Romulus at the founiding of the City was inaugurate Kling, or attained to the Crown by means of Augury: so also he would needs, that the will and counsel of God should be sought for, touching his own election. Where-G upon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that publick Ministry or Priesthood, in regard of honor and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the Castle hill, and there he set him down upon a flone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur on his left fide, with head covered, took his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staff without knot or knob, and hooked towards the top, which they called Lituus. From whence after that he had with good advise, taken a prospect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods. he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the right hand, and those Northward for the left. And so far as ever he could cast his eye and see H forward, he imagined to himself a mark: then shifting his staff into his lest hand, and laying the right hand upon Numa his head, he prayed in this form; () Father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawful, that this Numa Pompilius, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be King of Rome, shew I befeech thee tome certain and manifest signs within that compass and those precincts, that I conceived and set out. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by sight or flight of sowls he would have to appear. Which being once ieen, Numa was declared King, and so came down from the

Temple or place of prospect abovefaid. In this manner, being inaugurate and invested in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, Laws, and Customs, to re-edifie, as it were, that City, which beforetime had been new built by force I and arms. Whereunto, he feeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whole hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and favage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through diffuse of arms, he therefore built the Temple of Janus in the netherend of the street Argistum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it should fignifie, that the City was in arms; and standing shut, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the raign of Numa was this Temple shut : once, when T. Manling was Conful, after the first Carthaginian war was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in our age for us to see, when as the Emperor Cesar Anga-fins, after the battel of Allium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea. Numathen having knit the hearts of the borderers about him in firm league and amity, K and thereupon closed up the doors of Janus, secured now from all sear and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting lest through ease and idleness their minds mightfall to looseness and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in aw and good order: devised above all things to strike some fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policy no doubt, with the simple multitude (rude in those days and ignorant) most effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not fink nor enter well into their heads, and take a deep impression, without some device of a fained miracle, hemade semblance, and gave out, that he conversed in the night season, and had, I wot nos what, lecret conference with the goddes Ægeria. By whose counsel and direction for footh, he ordained such divine service and sacrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptations. ble: and to every god appointed several Priests for the ministery thereof accordingly. But first a- L bove all other things he divided the year, according to the course of the Moon, into twelve months: and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby some days are wanting to make up the just year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, fo diposed and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years space the days agreed just to the same point of the Sun from whence they began, and so made up the void spaces, and accomplishedfully the term of every year. He appointed likewife law days and days of paces, and accompanies and N_1 the state of the state this day pertain to the Priest of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a City so mar- M tial, there should succeed more Kingslike to Romulus then Numa, who in proper person would go forth to war: lest haply the divine ministry that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flamine to Jupiter, for to be a facrificer continually refident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or venment, and with an ivory chair of flate upon wheels, called Sella curulis, linto him he adjoined two Flaminesmore; one for Mars, another for Q sirinus, He inflituted also a Nunnery, as it were, of religious Vestal Virgins. A Priesthood that had the beginning from Alba, and futed well with the house, from whom the first founder of the City was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the Church, as researt Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary fee or pension, at the publick charges of the City: and made them by perpetual vowed virginity and other ceremonies to be reverenced and accounted holy. Likewife unto Mars Gradium hee- N lected twelve Priests called Salii, and gave unto thema rich purple coat, embroidered for an orna-ment, and to wear upon that coat a brazen brest-plate, and to bear certain cutchions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and fongs, with dancing and leaping full folernly, Moréover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numa Martus, the son of Marcus, one of the Senators: and to him he gave in writing fet down under his hand and feal, a rule, whereby he might know what beafts should be killed for facrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money should be levied and disburfed for the defraying of all charges. All other facer dires as well public as private, he submitted and reterred to the different and ordering of that high Prieft: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to refort for counsel and instruction, and that no part of O Gods worthip and service should by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, he confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and forraign superstitions. He ordained besides, that the same Arch-Prelate should teach, not only these heavenly ceremonies, but alsofuneral obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quieted and pacified : and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful light what loever, should be expiate and purged by sacrifice accordingly. And

A for to know the truth, portended by these tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above. for to know the tuting posteroscopy and to work the following the confectated unto Justice Elicina an altar upon the mount Avontine, And by the means of An Input Elicina gury, he confuded with that god, what things he was to enterprize and go abour. Whill the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and clean turned from thinking of force and arms, and whole multitude was and ordering of these matters, not only their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continual fear of God now setled in them, (as being perswaded that the heavenly power was prefent in the managing of mens affairs) had possetied now all their hearts with fuch piety and religious holiness, that faithful promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all fear of law and punishment, was able to rule and govern the City, And B as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their King, as the only and special pattern to follow: fo the nations likewife bordering upon them, who beforetime verily thought that City to be built, and as it were encamped in the midth of them to the disturbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become to respective of them, that they thought it an impious and finial deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that City, so well given, and devoted to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midst whereof was watered continually by a fpring that issued out of a dark and shadowed cave: into which, because Nume used very off to retire himself alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar company with Ageria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their assistance also in counpany want experiments of the properties of the p in an arched or embowed close Chariot, drawn with two horses, and to lacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: fignifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preferred: and that her feat was facred and confecrated even upon the right hands. Many other facritices, and places for facrifice, which the Priests call Argeos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthy and memorable, that during the time of his raign he had no lesse regard to preserve peace, then to maintain royal estate and dominion. Thus two Kings one alter another, taking either of them a several course by himself, that one by war, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the City, Romulus raigned 37. years, Numa 43. So that now the City became very pullant, as being well and equally tem-D pered both with teats of arms, as also with discipline of peace.

Upon the death of Numathe regiment returned again to an inter-raign. Then the people nominated and elected for their King, with the royal affent of the Senators Tullus Hoftilius, the Ne- Tulin Holling phew or Grandson of that Hostilius, who had in times pattfought valiantly against the Sabins, at the foot of the Castle hill. This man was not only unlike the former King, but also more fierce and hardy then Romulus himself. For besides the heat of youth, and itrength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandfather fet him on, and pricked him forward. Supposing therfore that the City through rest and ease began to age, as it were, and to decay, he sought every way to pick quarrels, and to give occasion to make war. It fortuned, that the Peasants about Rome, and those of Alba likewise, preyed upon and spoiled one anothers land. At that time C. Cluilius was Lord E and King of Alba. From both parts well neer at one time, were Embassadors addressed to demand reflicution of goods, and farisfastion for their harms. Tullus Hostilius he had firaitly charged his messengers to have no dealing with the Albam Prince, before they had delivered unto him their message. For well he wist, that he would make denial, and yeeld no amends: and then might he with fafeconfcience justly proclame war against him. On the contrary fide, the Alban Embassadors followed their business but slackly for being courteously invited; and friendly entertained by Tultur, and lodged within his palace; they were well content to be featled by the King, and were his dayly guests so long, that the Romans had by this time both challenged their own first, and upon denial made by the Alban King, given defiance and proclamed open war within thirty days next enfuing. Upon which tidings by them related to Tullus, he gave the Alban Embassadors audience permitting them to declare what their errand was, that they came about, "They (fimple men) ignorant The Embalador "of all that was done first from time in excusing themselvs, saying they were very loth & unwilling the saying the saying they were very loth & unwilling the saying the wil nor chale and therupon were come to make claim of goods & amends for wrongs, and if they at were not reftored and recompense made, they had commission to denounce war against him.

Whereunto Tullus made answer in this wife, "Tell your King and Master (quoth he) that the Roman King calleth the gods to witness, whether of the two Nations sent the Embassadors a-& way first, and rejected them when they demanded restitution, that upon his head they might bring the mifery, loss, and calamity of the present war. With this dispatch the Albans returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both fides allthat they could, most like in all the G world to a civil war, between fathers and fons, proceeding both from the Trojan race: confidering that by Trojans Lavinium was founded; from Lavinium came the people of Alba: and from the

Alban Kings were the Romans in right line descended. But the final issue and end of this war, made the war it self less woful and lamentable, both because they came not to a set field, and also for that by taking the houses only of the one City, two nations were intermingled & united in one. The Albans first with a mighty power entred the Territory of Rome, and encamped themselves not past five miles from the City, where they strongly entrenched themselves: which place of the Captains name was called * Foff a Cluit.e., many years afteruntil both it and the name with a lin process of time, decayed clean and came to nothing. In this camp the Alban King Cluiling ended his days, in whose itead the Alban army created Metius Sufferius their Dictator. Tullus in the mean timebecame haughty and proud especially upon the death of the King, oftentimes giving out and faying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begin at the very head, would likewife take vengeance on the whole body of the Alban Nation, for this their unjust and godless war: and one night above the rest passed secretly by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban land. This news raifed Metim out of his standing camp. Who led forth his army and marched on as neer to his enemies as he could, dispatching aforehand an Herald un-to Tullus, to notifie unto him thus much from him, that it was needful and expedient before they I joined battel to parle and commune together. If he would vouchfafe to confer, he knew very well, that he should alledge and lay forth such matters, as might content the Weale of the Romans, as well as of the Albans, Tulus resused not the offer, albeit they were but vain to its that were pretended, and therefore fet his men in battel aray. The Albans in like manner came forth against him. After they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both fides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobles, advance between both armies. Then began the Alban The Oration of Dictator in this wife: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear a leady of injury and wrongs done, and how the "We thinks (quoth he) I hear a leady of injury and wrongs done, and how full the same of the league, as also were demanded are not reflored again according to the form of the league, as also that Chailius our King was cause of this war: neither doubt I, O Tullus, but even you pretend, "that Ciminst our Aing was cause of this fire would as we ought to do, thand upon the truth of K and are about to alledge as much, But if we would as we ought to do, thand upon the truth of K "things rather then upon I wot not what gloffes, and goodly shews of words: it is ambition and defire of rule only and nothing elle, that spurreth on two nations of one blood and neer neigh-"bors to take arms and war one with another: justly or unjustly, I am not able to fay, Let him on "Gods name that first began the quarrel, in conscience see to that. As for me, the Albans indeed "have mademetheir General. But this one point Tullus, I would have you to remember and "Confider: How strong about us and you especially the Tuscans are, you know better, the needer "ye are unto them; mighty they are by land, much more by sea. Then wor well this, that when "you shall cause the Trumpet to sound unto battel, these two armies will be to them a fair mark "and spectacle to behold: that they may give an affault to both at once, as well the victors, as "them that are vanquished, whilst they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, L " if there be any spark of grace in us, since we not contented with that liberty which we surely en-" joy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazzard, which of us shall rule and command, and "who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may be decided without great loss or bloodshed on both sides, whether shall be Lord and Soveraign. The motion Tullus milliked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, whereunto fortune it felf presented fit matter and occasion. For by good hap even then, in either hoft three brethren twins there were born at one birth, and those neither in age nor strength unlike. Their names were Curiatii and Horatii, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in inbstance as it is, there re- M maineth fill some doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curiatii and the Horamainern miniome gours and error mainer mainers on whether people in contain and the Howariii were. Writers there be on both fides, but the peeter number fay, as I find, that Horatii were the Romans, to whom I rather enclinegand my mind givesh me rotollow them. With these three brethren the Kings went in hand, perswading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quarrel by dint of words shewing them, that on whether side the victory fell, there should require the constitution of the state of remainthe foveraign dominion. Nothing refused they to do, the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and these conditions drawn: That whose champions in fight should have the bester, that nation should peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and sindry Capitulations far different in matter: but they run all after one manner and form. As for this, it was N made, as we have heard in this wife, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any compofition whatfoever, The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wife: Is it your will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatrate of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you facred herbs. The King answered again, Take them pure and clean. The Fecial then reached from the Castle hill pure herbs from among the grass: which done, he thus asked the King: Do you (my Lord) ordain me the Messenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implements, all surriture for my self, and my retinute and train? The King answered: Ido, so far forth as, may be, without the harm or detriment of my felf, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Fecial or Herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpair are a King at Arms, Sp. O Fusing, by touching his head and hair with Vervain. Now the Paterpatrate is for to confirm the agreement with an oath and so he read out the covenant and oath, and that with many words: which to rehearfe, as they were in a long prefeript form pronounced, were very needless. After this having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof. "Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, liften "thou Herald for the Albans, attend also and give ear ye the Alban people, how these conditions " from the first to the last, have been read aloud out of those Books or Tables of wax, without

"Coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to "the tenure of the words: from their articles I fay, shall not the people of Rome start back first, "nor make default: If they shall first go back and fail therein by publick consent, and fraudulent-"ly; that day, O Jupiter, imite thou the City of Rome, as I to day will fitthe this Swine: yea. and "Imite thou home so much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my self. And after he had thus said, he smore the swine with a slint stone. The Albans likewise repeated their prescript form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priefts for the purpole. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then those three brethren of both fides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themselvs. And being encouraged on both hands, By by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native foile and parents, faying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whattoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and theirhands: the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lusty, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies, Now were the two holls let on both fides before their camps, rid of prefent danger.rather then void of care and pensiveness. For why? the whole trial of toveraignty and rule, rested in the valour and good speed of a few, Whereupon they longing to see the sequel and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleasant hight and spectacle. At sound of Trumpet these brave brethren, three to three like as they had been two fet battels and carrying the stomachs verily of two C great armies, affronted one another, and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge, Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but fet before their eyes, only the rule or fervitude of the Common-weal as if the state of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad fuccess in this action, Soloon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their harness The cruel con nuccess from action, 50100m as they of an every logarity and make anamy, that their names and weapons once clattered, and their drawn fwords from and glittered again, behold fuch an brethere fooisity exceeding (ear earne upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the mad Housing time of equal combat, seeing no inclination of victory to the one fide or the other, they were so aftonied, that hardly they could well freak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to hand-Broaks, and that now nor only the firring of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds allo were feen, two of the Romans D (having fore wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yeelded up the ghoft. At whofe fall, the Alban hoft shouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now past hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amated, and an extase as it were now pair nope or vicrory, yet they were not vote or care being amatee, and an extatee as it were, with very fear whar should become of him, who being but one, had three Cariatri upon him at once. But as good hop was, he as yet was freshend unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part god with them altogether, so in fingle fight, man to man, he though himselfe good enough for them all, one after another, To fingle therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would be the property of th give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far alimider, and but of them not much behind E himself, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Cariatii to rescue and succour their brother, Horatius by that time had slain his formost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fright recover themselves and take heart again, encourage their champion: and he himself hasteneth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had flain the second Curiatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand; and they, neither in hope nor drength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body is period wounded, and his double victory withal caused him to attempt the third conflict from the decision of the conflict from the conflict fr ming had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, feeing his two brethren lie flain at in his feet, offereth himself as a prey to his victorious enemy: for furely between them was no fight at all to (peak of The Roman, he triumphing and crying out for joy, Two brethren already (quoth hejhave I tent to the Divelether third likewing thall I fend after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the carle of all this war. And therewith he thrust his sword alost into his throat, who had much ado to hold his weapons and fo foon as he was down, fript and rifled him. "The Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius rejoicing so much the more, ce lelves to bury their champions, but not with like cheer and alacrity of hearts For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombs remain yet to be feen in the very places where they were each of them flain two of the Romans entombed together G in one place neerer unto Alba: the three Albans towards Rome, but diftant afunder, like as they fought and left their lives Before they diflodged and departed thence the one from another, Metius according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Tullus would command him to do: who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning, for that he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Veientians. So were the armies dilmifled home. And Horatius he wentformost baring afore him the threefold spoile of three Brethren, Whom his Sifter a maid affianced before to one of the Curiatii, met before Capena gare &

shis case was more dangerous and well neer de perate. Then of both sides address they them-

espying upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which she her self H had wrought with her own hands; the unbound her head, let her hair loofe, and pitiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the fifter presently upon victory, and amid fo great and publick joy, moved the proud and hauty young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewich, ran the filly damfel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy ipouse with thy unleasonable and foolhastly love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive : forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof: and to with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the less trespass: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before I the King, The King, that he might not feem the author of a judgment fo unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doom, affembled the people mno the people and said : I ordain Dumwist so fit upon Haratins, in trial of a criminal caufe of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that cafe provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form. The Magistranes called Duumvirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duumvirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they overthrow him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a curfed Gallow tree by a rope, and strangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either within the Pomæry or without] By ver-

tue of this law were the Dumwirs created, who by the rigour of that law thought they might not quit to much as a guildes person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave K fentence and faid: I judge thee O Publius Horavius a murderer and an enemy to the state of Rome. Go Listor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Listor and cast a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advise of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who quoti ne., so upon its appear in a constitue and to be time to be the expose. Who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this caule, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Fathers, crying out and faying, "That he deemed his daughter was justly and worshilly killed: otherwise he would himself have punished his son by his fatherly authority. Be-"feeching moreover, that they would not now make him childless, whom erewhile they saw with a goodly company of children about him. And therewithal the old father embracing the P. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess and valor, then in the right and equity of his cause. Yet to the end that the murder so manifest and openly known, should be in some fort expiate, and fatisfaction made therfore, his father was charged to purge his fons fin, and makeamends, at the expences of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory facrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and samily of the Horatii, put a raster or beam cross overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a york or gallows: which re-maineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the City charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Tigillum, i. e. The Sifters beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell N down, her tomb was erected of four square stone. But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three fouldiers, infected fo, and poisoned the vain and shittle head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he fought peace: and feeing his people had more heart then hand, and their frength not answerable to their flomacks: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and referved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practife treason and falshood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having O made the Veientians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake our and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tallus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and setteth forward against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped neer the confluent, where both freams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had croffed the Tyber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the

A left neerer to the mountains, Tulius directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates, The Alban Captain having as little heart as honeity and truth, neither durft keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdraweth himself toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, displayeth his ranks. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that flood next, perceiving their flanks naked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there gallopt an horseman, and advertised the King that the Albans were B gone away. Tulius in this fo fearful and dangerous case, vowed twelve Prietts Salin, and two Temples to Pallor and Pavor, i. e. to Paleness and Fear: and with a loud voice cryed out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the faid hor eman to return to the battel, laying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and setch about, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expresly moreover, to cause the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the sootmen could not fee the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had feen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to peak, fought fo much the morehotly. So the tear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he toake fo loud, and allo a great many of the Fidenatians being co-habitants with the Romans, C understood Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hils and flop their passage to the town, they turned their backsand fled. Then Tullus presseth hard upon them, and having discomfited the Fidenatians wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the fright of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at first from slying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: fomeflinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water other lingering fiil, and staying on the bank side, olub-ful whether to slee, or to slick to it and sight, were trod under soot, and hewne in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battel. Then the Alban army, which beheld and faw all this conflict, descended down into the plain. And Metins, forsooth, rejoiceth much on D Tullus behalf forhis victory. Tullus againspeaketh Metius fair, and gaveorder, that the Albans in a good hour should join their camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustral sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that allthings were in a readiness, according to the manner, he commandeth both armies to affemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first. Who also for the strangeness of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, present forward to stand next. The Roman legion on set purpose, as it was before decreed, stood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatfoever they were commanded.

Then began Tullus to speak in this wife, "If ever in any war heretofore had cause, O Romans, The Oration E "to render thanks, first to the immertal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, cer- of Tullus. tainly it was in yesterdays battel. The Centurions flood armed round about Merius, and the Kinggoeth on with the rest of his speech as he began, and faid: "That which I pray God may turnto the good prosperity and happiness of the to people of Rome, of my self, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to es Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentle-"men to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common-wealth: that as in "times past the Albans state, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may be united G "and become one again. At these words the Alban youth unarmed, and beset on every side with

Then forthwith " he cauled two reames of four houses to befer to, and Merins to be firetched out and tied unto the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the horses driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in pieces, as far forth as the limbs hung fall together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men avert their eyes from beholding to cruel and horrible a spectacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romans executed with so little respect or none at all(tosay a truth) of the laws of humanity. In all other they may safely make their boalt, that no nation in the world hath been lesse delighted and pleased with extremity of

Whill thesethings were in doing, there had been certain horsemen sent afore to Alba, for to translate the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions also of the tootmen thither led, to rate and deftroy the city. At whose entrance within the gates, there was not that flir nor fearful hurry, as usually is seen when cities are lost: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the wals with rams and other engins, forcing the citadel, the enemies shout, and the armed touldiers run to and fro in the city, killing and flaying, firing and burning all afore them as they go: but a fad filence, and a fill kind of forrow and penfivenels fo poffelled and aftonied all their minds, that for fearforgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without ad ife and couniel, one asking another what to do, they one while flood in their house entries, another while ran up and down wandring in their houses, as if their last day had been K come. But to toon as they heard the horfemen cry aloud, and command them with menacing to void and depart, and that now the rathing of the tiles and flates from off the houses as they were a pulling down, was from the furthest part of the town heard: and that the dust raised from places far off, had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: then every man catching up hasting, and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domettical gods, leaving their houles wherein they had been born, bred, and brought up, departed forth: to that now they filled the fireets as they went close on a row together, and the fight one of another with mutual commileration, redoubled their tears and worull complaints. Yea, and pitious mone and lamentations were heard of women especially, as they passed by their fair and stately churches, befer with souldiers, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and priloners. After the Albans had thus quit the city down went the Romans every where with the buildings, as well publick as private, and laid them even with the ground and so in one hour destroyed and rated four hundred yeers work, for so long had Alba flood and flourished. How beit the tempies of the gods they spared for so the king had given commandment. Rome all this while riseth by the sall of Alba. The number of Citizens increased double : to enlarge the city the mount Celius was annexed to it : and that it should be better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus had his royal feat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albans he advanced to the order of Senators, that he might augment that state also of the Commonweal; namely, the houses of the Tullij, Servilij, Quintij, Geganij, Curiatij, Cloelij: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he built an hall or new court, called until our fathers dayes Hollilia curia. M i. Hoft liar court. And that all estates and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat strengthened, he chose from out of the Albans ten troops or cornets of horsemen, and with the same supply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his strength and power, denounceth war against the Sabins, a people in those dayes of all other most puissant and mighty, both in men and municion, next the Tuscans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tulius found himself grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great relort before the temple of Feronia, were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other fidecomplained, that their men, not with franding N they took fanctuary in a certain facred and priviledged grove, were arefted and in hold at Rome.

These were the quarrels and occasions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembring, that not onely part of their own forces was by Tatius translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puissance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albans, began likewise for their part to cast about, and seek for help abroad, and forrain aids. Now was Tuscan their neighbour nation, and of the Tuscans the neerest unto them were the Veientians. From then e they gat certain voluntaries to take their part, by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and rancour remaining still of the former war past: othersome also vagarants and idle persons of the raical fort, and needy commons, were soon hired for mony, But as for any succour from thence by publick consent of the state they had none at all. So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the rest it was less marvel) the faithful covenant. of trace concluded with Rimulus. Now when these preparations of war were made an both sides to the uttermost of their power, and that it stood upon this point, That they were like to have the ods and vantage, who should begin fire, and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies and invaded the Sabine land. A sharp and bloody battel was there fought under the wood Malicusa. Where the Romans bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionary

A footmen, but more upon the strength of their men of arms, whose number lately was augmented: for by the fuddain and forcible charge of the horfemen, the battel of the Sabins was fo broken, The Sabins their ranks fo diffordered, that they could neither fland cloie together to fight it out, nor yet defeated by the

fpred themselves to flie, without great flaughter and bloodshed. The Sabins thus vanquished, and the kingdom of Tullus and the whole flate of Rome, Feing very glorious and wealthy: behold, news came to the King and Senators, that in the Al as mount it rained tiones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men were fent of purpose to see this strange and prodigious tight: who might plainly behold stones to fall thick out of the skie like as when lome torcible winds drive hail in big round bals upon the earth. They imagined more-B over, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grove from the very top of the hill trying unto them, and warning the Albans to do factifice and divine fervice according to the rites and ancient maner of their forefathers, which they had discontinued and forgotten as if together with their country they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Roman fashion, or elfebeing angry with fortune (as it is commonly item) forlet and neglected the worthip of the gods aling angry with fortune tash is commonly leaf for the and regreted the world of the good attogether. The Romans likewife upon that miraculous fign, for the purging and explaint on thereof, celebrated folemn publick facrifices for the space of nine dayes, called a Novembial: either because they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that also is reported) or took direction from the Soothfayers that pry into the inwards of beafts. Certain it is, that a folemn cuitome remaineth ftill unto this day, that whentoever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holyday C nine dayes together. Not long after this, the pestilence raigned in the city. And about the people began thereby to flack foundery and military service: yet would not this martial prince give them reft and respite from war : being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the city under covert: until himfef at ength fell fick of a long and lingering disease. Then that haughty and contagious formack of his, together with his lufty and able body, became so abated, that he who carlt before thought nothing less besitting a king, than to set his mind, and busy his brains about religious ceremonies; now all upon a fuddain became wholly devoted to all kind of superfittion both more and lesse, yea, and filled the peoples heads befides with holiness and devotion. So as now the very common fort wishing again for the old world, under the reign of king Nama, were fully perswaded, that there D was no other remedy left for their fick and dileased bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and pardon, Men fay, that the king himfelt in perufing and turning over the Commentaries and regi-flers of Numa his predeceffour, and therein finding certain hidden and folemn facrifices that had been unto Iupiter Elicius, retired himielf, and kept close within a house to celebrate the same, But for that this holy fervice was neither begun aright, nor duly administred, he had not onely no divine apparition and heavenly vinon presented unto him, but also incurred the heavy displacture and wrath of Ispiter, whom by his prepoterous religion he had thus disquieted; and so both himself and his whole house were confumed with lightning. This Tullus, in great glory and renown of martial prowefs, raigned two and thirty years.

When Tullur was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the first beginning or-E dained, unto the Senators; who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people elected Ancus Martius for their King, and the Senators gave their affent thereto. This Ancus Martius, was Numa Pompilius his daughters fon, who fo foon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and also in regard of the raign of his next predecessor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this onely failed, and was not so happy either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exercifed; and thinking it a thing most necessary, and of greatest moment, to reduce all publick divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Numa, commanded the Arch-prelate or High-priest to make an extract, and transcript of all the facred rites and mysteries out of Nama his Commentaries, and ingrois them into one table, and to publish them a-F broad unto the people: whereby both his inbjects and citizens defirous of peace, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope. that theking would altogether comform himself, and take after the customes and ordinances of his grand-father. Hereupon the Latins, with whom in King Tullus his dayes a league was made, took heart unto them, made inrodes into the countrey about Rome, and fetcht out booties. And when the Romans demanded reflitution, they made them a proud answer, supposing belike, That the King of Rome would pais the whole course of his raign in ease and idlenels, sitting Hill in his chappels, and by his holy altars. But Aneus was of a mean and indifferent diffortion by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Romu us, and composed as it were of both. For over and befides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessary for his grandsires reign, the G people being as then but new rifen, unfetled, and fierce withal: confidering allo, that himfelf should not easily, without taking wrong, enjoy the quierness which to him happed: for that his parience was already tried, and not onely tried, but also despised: and seeing that the State of the present time was fitter for a Tullus to be King, than a Numa: yetro the end that, as Numa in time of peace infittuted ceremonies of religion, to he might likewife fet out to poferity others concerning war : and that wars should not be onely made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious form of solemnity:

he fet down in writing that law and formal order, by vertue whereof restitution is demanded H (which at this day the Feciales or Heralds observe) like as he received it from the ancient people

The Embassador Fe.ial, coming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required again, covering his head with a bonnet or wail of woollen yarn, faith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of such and such a Country) let Justice and Right hearken also 10 what i shall say: I am the publick message of the people of Rome, of a just and religious embassing am what i shall say: I am the publick message of the people of Rome, of a just and religious embassing am I come, and to my words give credit. After this, rehearseth he all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witness, saying, If I winfily and impiously demand, that such persons should be delivered, or such as the such as suc into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him whomsoever he meeteth first: the self same words he pronounceth, as he entreth within the gate of the City: yea, and when he is come into the market place he faith the same, changing and varying in some few tearms, from the prescript form of the demand, and taking the solemn oath. In case then, the persons whom he requireth, be not yeelded after 33. days expired (for so many just are usually granted) then proclameth he war in this wife. Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thou: ye celeftial Saints all, and terrefrial nums when a print also life m and give car. I callyou all towiness, and protess before you, that this nation (naming them whosever they be) is unjust, and dash not according to right and equity. But of these matters will we consult at kome in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how K we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsel, and presently the King would in these or such like words, fitting in Councel with his Peers, move them in this ma-ner. Whereas the Paterpatrat or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Paterpatrat, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latines, and with the folk of the ancient Latines, concerning certainthings, differences, sutes, and causes thereupon depending; which things they have neither yeelded nor paid, nor performed and done; which ought to have been paid, reelded, performed, and done; what is your judgment? speaking to him, whole opinion first he asketh in this case, Then (faith he) My advice is that those things be fought for and recovered by mere force, by just and lawful war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine resolutely. After him were the other asked in course : and when the greater number of them who were present accord thereunto, T. then by general consent, they were wont to proclame war in this order: That the Fecial or King at Arms should go with a javelin, having an iron head, or with a red bloody spear burnt at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least, not under fourteen years of age, should say thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latine felt have praitifed and tre fraffed against the people of Rome and the Quirties, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirties have so determined, consented, and agreed, that war should be made with the ancient Latines; I therefore together with the people of Rome, do denounce and proclame and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latine folk, And when he had thus faid. he lanced his spear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was reflittion demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclamed: which order of proceeding, M their posterity by tradition received.

Ancus having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamins, and the other Priests, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Poluorium, a City of the Latines, And following the usual manner of the former Kings hisprogenitors, who had mightily encreased the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeia, and the Albans replenished the mount Calius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwellin. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficara. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Politori- N mm gain: for that whileft it flood void and empty, the old Latines had surprised and taken it.
Which was the cause, that the Romans destroyed that City quite, that it should not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful iffue of fight, and inter hangeable victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and furnished with a strong garrison of men: and also by reason that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, hadfundry times with banners displayed, encountred hand to hand with the Romans. At the last Ancus bending his whole power against them, first gave them an overthrow in a set battel: and so having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome. At that time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the City; Who to the end, that O the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the Temple of * Murtia. The Janiculum likewise was adjoined unto the City not for want of ground, but because it might not be at any time a fortress and hold for the enemies : which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but allo for more commodious paffage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirties fols or ditch allo, no small defence against the easie access from the plain grounds, was a work of Anous. Thus theestate being

A grown to exceeding strength and bigness when as now info huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of well doing or ill, and thereby many mischies and outrages began fecretly to be committed for to restrain therefore with some terror, such boldnessinges fing dayly more and more, there was a goal or common priton built in the heart of the City, even over against the common place of affembly. And in this Kings days not only the circuit of the City was enlarged, but also their Lands and Territories. For by reason that the forrest Magia was conquered from the Veientians, their Seignory reached to the Sea . where, in the very mouth of Tyber was the town Hestin built, and the falt pits made there about, and upon such noble exploits by arms atchieved, the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was inmore ample and glorious manner re-B edified.

The first Book of T. Livius.

In the reign of Ancus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a defire especially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquinii (where he was born, although descended of fortuign parentage) he had no means to attain unto. The Son he was of Demaratus the Corinthian, who upon civil troubles and diffentions having fled his country, and by chance planting himself in Tarquinii, there married a wife and had iffue by her two ions, named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo survived his father, and became heir of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child : neither lived the father Dema-atus long after his fon, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and sons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and so departed C this world. Whereupon the child after his Grandfires decease being born to no part of his goods, for his poor condition, was called Egerins. But Lucumo on the other fide, the fole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloft, to he grew much more proud for his marching in marriage with Tanagnilya dame of a right noble house descended, and who could hardly bear a lower estate and degree then that wherein she was born. When she was once married, and faw the Tuscansto disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and hanished person, she could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, so she might see her husband raised to high promotion, she resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinii and depart. To which purpose and design, Rome seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus the projected and discoursed : That in a City lately founded, where D all kind of Nobility suddenly cometh up, and ariseth from vertue and prowess, her husband a valorous and industrious man must needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tatius a Sabin born, had raigned there: that Numa was from Cures fent for thither, and called to the Crown: that Ancus also a Sabin by his mothers side, had the only image of Numa to shew for his Nobility. Thus the foon perswaded him, as being a man ambitious and defirous of honor, and whose mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make less scruple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuned that to Janiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinius fat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying downfrom aloft, and took up his bonnet from his head, and foaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if the had been fent from Heaven to do
E this feat, let it gently and handlomly on his head again: which done, the mounted on high, and flew away. Tanaguit, as they lay, embraced this Angury with great joy, being a woman skilful, as commonly all the Turcans are, in fuch prodigious fights and apparitions from heaven; and therewith taking her husband about the neck, willed him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high preferments: faying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the Heaven, addressed as a messenger from such a god, and shewed a divine token and presage upon the highest part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that flood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entred the City: where they took an house, and from thence forth he wascommonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming and his F wealth withal, made him well known: and himselfalso besides, set forward his good fortune by courteons and fair speech and affable language to every man, by friendly enviring, and liberal featting, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns: fo far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing fervice and fingular dexierity, in short time he had not only access to the Kings knowledge, but also entredinto familiar acquaintance and friendship with his Highness. Insomuch, that both in private Councels and publick consultations, as well at home as abroad, he was always present, and bare a great stroak. And having in all kind of offices carried himself with credit, was in the end by the Kings last Will and Testa. ment made Tutor or Protector of his children: Thus raigned Ancus 24. years, for glory and repu- The end of tation of his fage government, as well in wat as in peace, equal to any of the former Kings his Auton G predeceffors.

Now were his fons neer 14. years of age when he died. Tarquinius therefore made the more haste, that the high Court of Parliament should with all speed possibly be summoned for creation of a King, which being against a day proclamed, he sent away the boys to the chase a hunting, at the very inftant of the faid election. He himself (as men fay) was the first, that both ambitious ly fought for the Crown, and also for to win the hearts of the Commons, devised and framed an eloquent Oration, "Saying, it was no new and strange thing that he stood for: And why?he was not "the first that any man should be offended, or make any wonder Jour the third alien that in Rome H "affected and appired to the Kingdom: rhat both Tatius, not of a forraigner only, but of an ene-"my became King: and Numa likewife, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State, "was without any fute or or feeking of his part, by the Romans fent for, & advanced to the crown, "As for himself, he alledged and said, that from the time that he was at his own liberty and dispose " of himfelf, he with his wife & all that he had removed and came to Rome and of that age wherin "men are employed in civil affairs, he had ipeut a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient "country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the "knowledg of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an ex-"cellent mafter, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance I "about the King, he had endeavoured to pass all others: and for liberality and courtesse towards " all others, he had thriven to go beyond the King. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth and pleaded, and that right truly; the people of Rome with exceeding great conlent elected him their King. Who being a man otherwise of fingular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious in feeking the kingdom, to continued he still, when he ware the crown: and minding no leis to establish his own tare and throne, than to maintain the good estate of the Common-weal, headvanced one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Gentium Paires, as a men would fay, Senators of a later fort, and meaner quality. A faction, no doubt to take part and fide with the King by whole means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war he made, was with the Latins: from whom by force he wonthe town Appiola: from thence ha- K ving brought away a greater pillage in proportion than the war imported in brute, he fet forth gamings and plays more stately and with greater surnitureand provision than the other Kings before his time. Then was the plot or compals of ground first set out & appointed for the lists or theater, called now * Circus maximus wherein were affigued scaffolds for the Senators, and for the Gentlemen or Knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the passimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner sood they to behold: namely, upon scaffolds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were running of horles, and fighting at fifts and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions lent for of purpole, especially out of Tulcan, These sports continued asterwards from year to year in great (olemnity, and named diverfly, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This L King moreover affigned certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build in where the galleries and shops were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with a stone wall, but the Sabin war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that work, This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear there was at Rome. And at the first a cruel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts, but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his only want was in his cavalry, determined to join unto the Rhamnenfes, Titienfes, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained, other Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the posterity after him, bearing his M own name. Which because Romulus had done aforetime by the counsel and advise of Augurs, Accius Navius tenowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, opposed himself and gave out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf, unless the birds first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his art, as they say: Come on Sir Soothlayer (quoth he) areed, and tell me by the flight of your birds, whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navins, who had first made proof therof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in very deed be effected. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone afunder with a raior; Heretake them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowls foreshew may be done: then as the report goeth, without more ado he cut the whethone quite in two. And in that N very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius was erected, with his head covered, even in the Comitium, at the stairs thereof on the left hand of the Curia or Council house, It is reported that the whethone also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity following, of that miracle. Certainly, both Auguries, and the Prieflhood and Colledg of Augurs from that time forward was so highly honored, and had in such reverence, that never after was there ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home but by their counsel and advise, Assemblies of people immoned were dismissed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged, yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid afide, when the birds allowed not thereof. Neither did Tarquinfor that tims alter the Centuries of the horiemenany whit, only he redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1300, horse: and those O later fort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because they be double, are called the fix Conturies, Tarquin thus having encreased that part of his power, bade the Sabins battel the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in strength well amended, he devised also privily a subtilestratagem, and set certain men to set on fire a mighty flack of wood, lying upon the bank of Anie, and fo to cast it into the river: the wood burning still by the help of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge, and there sticking close together with the boats and planks, fired and consumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabins in their fight, and when they were discomfitted, troubled them much, and hindred their flight: fo that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the much, and minuted their man way on so floating down the yber, were known at Rome, and brought very river. Whole armor and weapons floating down the yber, were known at Rome, and brought news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horsemen won greatest price and praise. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged to forcibly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marshalled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions pressing hard and sercely upon those that be-B gan to shrink and give back, but all at once put them to fight. The Sabins ran amain towards the mountains, but few gat thither: for the greater number, as we faid before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tarquinus thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were frighted, after he had fent to Rome, the borry with the prifoners, and burned on a great heap together (as he had vowed to Vulcan) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already sustained an overthrow, and could not hope for better success, yet because they had no time to consult and advife with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that stir be raised, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make their part good, they fued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabins, Egerius the Kings brothers fon, was left with a garriton at Collatia to keep that place. And The form of far-(as I find upon record) the Collatins were yeelded into his hands, and the manner of their furrender went in this order. First, the King demanded thus and faid: Are ye Embassadors, or deputed affigns ient from the people of Collai a to make furrender both of your felves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collaria in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (fay they.) Do ye also render up your selves, the people of Collana their town, their territory and lands, their waters their limits, their temples, their houshold stuff and implements, and all thing elfe, as well facred as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome, We do yeeld (fay they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabin war thus finished, Tarquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred D upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so far on any side, as to join issue in a general battel, and one fet field for all. But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as these towns, Corniculum, old Ficulnea, Cameria, Crustumerium, Americla, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this enfued peace. Then was he more earnestly bent to go forward with his works, begun in time of peace, then he was before bused in managing of his wars: insomuch, as he gave the people no more repose at home, then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to compais the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a stone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised also certain E draughts or vaulted finks from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept dry the base City, or lowest grounds about the market place, and the other vallies between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not eafily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war, his mind even then giving him, that one day it should be a stately place.

At the same time there hapned in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whole name was Servius Tullius, as he lay afleep, in the fight of many persons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcry raised at the wondering of to great a matter, the King arose and when one of the houshold brought war ter to quench the flame, he was by the Queen flayed. And after the flir was somewhat appealed, the forbade theboy to be disquieted, until such time as he awoke of himself: and within a while as the fleep departed, the blaze likewife went out, and vanished away. Then Tanaquil the Queen taking her husband afide into a fecret room. "See you this boy (quoth she) whom we so homely Tasqual the skeep, and in so poor and mean estate bring up? Wot well this, and know for certain, that he will Grant the state of the "one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairsihe will be the chief " pillar and fuccour of the afflicted state of the Kings house. Let us therfore cherish and foster with 46 all kindness and indulgence the subject matter of so great a publick and private ornament. Wherupon they began to make much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to instruct and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are stirred to great enterprises, and to G atchievehigh place of wealth and honor. And foon came to that pais, which pleased the almighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and towardness in such fort that when there should be a son in law sought out to match with Tarquinus his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in any respect, So as the King affianced his daughter unto him. This fo great honor whereunto he was advanced upon what foere cause or occasion it was, induceth me to think he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilf he was a little one, as a flave. I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

The first Book of T. Livius. When Corniculum was won, the wife of Scrvius Tullius, a great Lord and principal personage of M that City, and there flain, was left great with child: and being among other captives known whole wife she was, in regard of her rare nobility only, was by the Queen preserved from servicude, and at Rome in Priscus Tarquinus his house, was delivered of a child upon which so special favor, there grew more familiar acquaintance between the two Ladies, the Queen and her felf; and the child also brought up of a little one there in Court, was both tenderly beloved, and also highly regarded, But his mothers fortune, whose hap was after her country was loft, to fall into the hands of enemies, can'ed men commonly to think that he was the ion of a bond-flave. Now in the 38th, year almost, after that Tarquinius began his reign, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not only with the King, but also with the nobility and commons, Then the 2, sons of An- I cm, who as they always before diddained in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitful practife of their guardian, so unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers Kingdom, and that a stranger raigned at Rome, one who was not descended of any neighbor house thereby, no nor so much as of Italian blood: to now they began much more to take flomach and indignation, in case that after Tarquinius, the Kingdom should not return unto them and their line, but should stil run on end, and headlongwife fall unto fuch base variets: That in the same City, 100. years almost after that Romalus the fon of a god, and a god him elf, raigned therein, (during the time he remained here upon the earth) a very bond-slave and no better, and one born of a bond-woman. should be possessed of the Crown: and that it would be a foul stain and dishonor generally to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house & samily, if whilst the issue Male of Ancustived, the K Kingdom of Rome fhould lie open, and be exposed, not to ftrangers alone, but which is more to very bond-men and flaves. This ignominy therefore, and open wrong, they resolve by meer force to put by and avoid : howbeit, the grievance of this injury done unto them, fer them on against Tarquinius himself, rather then Servius Tullius; both for that the King if helived Hill, would be a more sharp revenger of the murder, then a private person: and also it they should happen to kill Servins, whomsoever besides, the King would vouchfase for his son in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, and inheritor also of the Kingdom. For these considerations they lay wait for to murder the King himself in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two palfing flout and flurdy herdmen chosen who having such rustical iron tools about them, as they were wont both of them to occupy, and made a great flew of a most tumultuous brawl and fray in the L very porch of the Court gate by which means, they drew all the Kings officers, fergeants, and guard about them i then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other upon the King, in fuch wife, as the noise was heard within the palace, they were convented before his Highnels, At their first coming they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outragious manner, fo as by a sergeant they were fain to be restrained and commanded to speak by turns, until at length they gave over their confused brawlings. Then one of them on set purpose, as it was before agreed upon, began his tale: and while the King as wholly bent to give ear turned afide towards him, the other lift his Ax aloft, and ftruck the King on the head, and leaving it flicking there fill in the wound, they whipt out both of them together, and ran their ways. And whilst they that flood next about Tarquinius; took him up ready to die, the lergeants made after them that were M fled, and apprehended them. Wherupon an outery arole & a great concourse of people, wondring what the matter might be. Tanaquil in this hurliburly caused the Court gates to be shut, and commanded every one to avoid the place : and at one instant with great diligence provideth things requifite to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life: and withal, if that should fail, she prepareth other means and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servins, when she had shewed him her husband half dead, and already blood es the took him by the right hand, and besought him not to suffer, either the death of his father-in-law unrevenged, or his wives mother to be a laughing flock unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdom O Ser-" vins by right (quoth she) if thou be a maniaud not theirs, who by the hands of others have com-" mitted a most shameful & villainous fact, Take a good heart therfore, and arm thy self, and follow N "the guidance and direction of the gods, who long fince by a divine and heavenly flame burning " about thy head, foreshewed that one day it should be highly advanced. In this while the noise and violence of the people was so great, that it " could not well befuffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper loft of the house, out at a window that openedinto the new street (for the King kept his Court hard by the Temple of Jupiter Stator) spake unto the people willing them to be of good cheer. "The King indeed (quoth she) was amafed and iwooned at the judden firoak, howbeit it went nothing deep for now is he come again O "to himself his wound cleansed from blood, and searched: all signs of life, and no danger of death: "and I trust in God within a whil you shall see himself again. In the mean time his pleasure is, that "the people shall be obeylant to Servius Tullius; he shall minister justice and give laws, he shall execute and perform all the offices of the King. The lons of Ancw at the first, feeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the King was alive, and Servius fo mighty, retired themselves as banished persons to Sueffa Pometia, And Servius now fought means to make himself strong, as well by private helps, as by publike. And lest peradventure the children of Tarquinius should another day be as ill affected against him, as the chil-B dren of Ancus were against Iarquinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Aruns, two of the Kings sons late deceased. Yet could not he with all the policy of mans wit flay the fatall necessity, nor stop and divert the course of the dellinies; but that the envy that followeth a Kingdom bred all district, disloyalty, and malice, even among those of his own houshold, for all their ailiance and affinity. Howbeit in very good time, and fitly for the quietness of the present state, was the war with the Verentes (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tuscans, takenin hand. In which war, both the valour, and also the good fortune of Tullius was well feen and greatly renowned. Who having difformitted a mighty host of the enemies, as undoubted King in the conceit and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been jounded returned to Kome.

Then in hand went he with a work of peace, and of all other the greatest, and of most importance. To the endsthat as Numa was the first author of divine Law and Religion : so the posterity forever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all diffinction and orders whereby between degrees of worship and wealth there might be seen due difference, and regard of worth. For he devised and ordained the Cente, to wit, the Affelling, and Taxation of the Citior worth. For ne device and ordained the and government, which was like in time to come to stion of the progrow fo mighty. By which Cente, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll upon the Citizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and ability. So he erected certain Classes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to Asor Affica and ability. So ne erected certain Ciaper and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, and valuation, meet in decent manner to ferve in war, and meet to be employed in price of bath in the affelding, and valuation, meet in decent manner to ferve in war, and meet to be employed. D peace. And first of those who were rated at an hundred thousand Affer and above, he ordained his peace. And first of those who were rated at an inundred thousand Affect and above, ne ordained an interest and all joyntly were counted the fielding the fielding and as many of the younger: and all joyntly were counted the fielding.

first Classis. The elder were charged to be in readiness at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. These were bound to find harness, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or morion, a shield, greeves, and corselet, all of brais: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a tword. To this Classis were adjoyned two Centuries of Carpenters and Smiths, or Enginers, who were in wage, and served without armour: and their charge was to find the Campe Engines of battery and artillery. The second consisted of those that were valued between 100000 and 75000 Affes. And of this fort both young and old were enrolled twenty 324 lb.7 fb. Centuries: who were enjoyned to provide for their armour, a target or buckler inflead of a E shield; and excepting only a correlet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of those that were eleemed worth * 50000 Asses, and as many Centuries of them, and with the * 1561.15, 5th fame diffinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their fleril greeves they were dispensed with. In the fourth Classis were those that were assessed in the Subfidy book, between 50000 and 25000 Affes, and of them were formany Centuries. Their ar- 47811-16-4. mour was changed, having no more but a spear and a casting dart, with a loop called Vernum. The fifth was greater, containing thirty Centuries. These carried with them slings and stones to sling afar off: among whom were reckoned the beadles or criers, together with the trumpeters and cornettiers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band flood of them that were affelfed from 25000 unto * 11000 Affes. The valuation under this comprised all the rest of the multip tude. Whereof arose one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furnished and disposed the forces of the Infantry, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and those out of the principall men of the City: and six other Centuries likewise, to those three that Rome lus inflituted, retaining the same name still that they in their first tolern institution had These horsemen for to buy their great horses had * 10000 Asses out of the chamber of the City *3.1.16.5.4h. a peece: and for to find and keep those horses were the rich widdows set yearly at *2000 Asses a *6,1105.61. peece. Thus were all these charges and burdens shifted from off the poormens shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honour so much the more. For in the grand-leets and solemnelections of Magistrates, every man had not prerogative alike, nor equall authority, as Romul s first ordained, and the other Kingscontinued, when they gave their G voices by the poll indifferently, one with another: but there was diffinction made, and certain degrees; butto, as neither any one was excluded or four out, and yet the whole refled and lay in the power of the richer fort, and chief of the City. For first the horsemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the first Classis, of the principall sootmen: who if they ditagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the second Classis were cited. And never went they likely to low as to the last of all. Neither ought any man to marvell, that this order in thele daies, after five and thirty tribes compleat, agreeth not with the Centuries of the elder and yonger fort, according to the computation fet down by Servius Tullius, confidering their H number is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hils; those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as I suppose,) For he it was that deviled and brought up the manner of equal contribution and paiment, proportionably to the affeisment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples sear of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registred and enrolled in the Subsidy book; he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, I shew himself in Campus Martius, i.e. in Mars field. There, after he had mustered and embattelled the whole Army, he affoiled and purged the same with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull, And this was called Conditum Lustram. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Lustrum there were numbred and assessed 80000 Citizens, Fabius Pictor, a most ancient writer faith moreover, that so many there were of able mento bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoyneth unto it two hils more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Esquilia: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himfelf, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it : by occasion whereof, he let out the Pomorry further. Pomærium, according to the E- K tymology and literall fignification of the word, is as much to fay, as Postmærium, or the Arriermure, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either fide, which the Tuicans in old time, when they built their Cities, used by advice of Augurs, to hallow and confecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to fet the wall: that neither within, the houses might joyn upon the wall (whereas now adaies they build close to) and without also there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied ofmen. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because it was without the wall, as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomærium. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be let out further so far those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomœry were extended. L

Thus the City being much increased in compass of building, and all things disposed in good order, requifite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not alwaies seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martiall prowess only, he attempted to amplifie his dominion by policy, and withall to bestow upon the City some glorious ornament to beautifie the same. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephefus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servins would use highly to praise and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in publike and private, mutual entertainment and familiar acquaintance) that generall agreement of the Princes of Asia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following still that theam, he prevai- M led with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Templeunto Diana: which was a plain confession, and clear case, that Rome was now the imperiallieat, for which they had to often warred. This quarrell, albeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, feeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and specifo badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a savourable aspect, and yee'd good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperiall dignity unto the Latines, A certain housholder sorsooth, of the Sabins, had, as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bigness, and faire withall, (for a memorial) of which so rare and wonderfull beast the horns were set up, and remained fast fixed in the porch of Dianas Temple, many a hundred years after:) this was supposed (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the N wife men or wizards prophesed, that the soveraignty and Empire should be setled and established in that State, whereof any one Citizen factificed that cow unto Diana, This prophefie came to the ears of the Priest of Dianas Temple. The Sabin abovesaid, so soon as he had espied a meet and convenient day for facrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there presented her besore the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondring to see so huge a beast, whereof there had been so much speech, and calling to mind with all the foresaid Oracle, spake to the Sabin in this wife, My friend (quoth he) what mean you to sacrifice so uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather putifie and wash your self all over in some running stream, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of conscience, who defired nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that an O happy fuccess might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana. This thing pleased the King and the whole City wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now withour all question by so long continuance, fully and really invefled in the Kingdomiyet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius otherwhile gave out speeches of hims that he raigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had A first wan the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certaine lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should raign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this. had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more, because he understood the faid division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and palfed against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servins before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become frong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was B both himself a young man of great courage and hot flomack, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his diftempered and troubled mind : for you must think, that the royall Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragicall and horrible act: that by a weariness and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberry and freedom might the fooner enfue: and that raign be the last, which was by mischief gotten first, This L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, it is not very clear, howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son, A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullie, the Kings daughters, and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it so fell out that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such

C was the good fortune, I beleeve, of the Roman people, that thereby the raign of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and fettled in good order. The younger Tullia, aftout dame and a proud grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metall or matter at all either to covet and desire, or to enterprise and adventure : her mind was fully set upon the other Targain, him the effeemed highly, and had in admiration, him the faid to be a man indeed, and defected of royall bloud. As for her fifter, the despited and checked her, for that the having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, fat fit il), and feconded him not in andacity and bold-neis, as a woman should do, Well, in short time likeness and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly feen, Naught will to naught, and fort best together. But the mischief and troublethat brought all up-fide down, arose from the woman. For she using to have secret D conference with her fifters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto hisbrother, and of her fifter unto her husband, "Affirming in good earneft, it were better both forher felf to be a widow, and for him to live fingle, and without a wife, than fo to be mif-"marched as they were, and through the craven cowardife of others to languish and come to no-thing. As for her felf, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and worthiness, the doubted not to see, and that very shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now " fhe feeth in her fathers, In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashness and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servins his leave and con-E nivency, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continual mote in their eies, his old age hatefull, and his raign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mifchief upon another: and would not fuffer her husband to be at reft night nor day, left peradventure the former murders done and path, should serve to no purpose, and mits the effect of their defignments. And thus the brake out and faid, That the wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom the ferved, and kept her felf quiet and faid nothing." But the had a want of one, that thought himfelf worthy of a kingdom, that remem-" bred he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seised of a Crown and stepter tions of a woman went about laboured and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and savours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the likegood turn at their hands. The young men.the flower and manhood in generall of the City, he wrought and won to himself with gifts: and so H partly with great promises, what wonders would he do, and partly with raising slanders upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the laft, elpying a convenient time to let on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, he entred forcibly into the Forum or common place of affembly, whereat the people all jurprized with great feare, he fat him down upon the Kingsthrone, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before King Tarquinius. Who forthwith there affembled together: Some thereto made and prepared aforehand others, for fear left their not coming might turn them to displeasure. And as they were aftonied at this strange and wonderful fight, so they thought Servins utterly un- I done, and his case desperate. There Tarquinius began an invective inspightful & reproachful terms, touching the fift pedigree or parentage of Servius: faying, that he being a flave, &born of a bond-" woman, after the cruel and shamefull death of his father Tarquin, usurped the Kingdom: not by means of an Interregn, as the order was aforetime, nor by a folemn affembly, and the free voices of the people, nor yet by the affent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one wo-"man, And as he was (quoth he) thus born and thus created King, to hath he been a partial favorer es ever of the basest fort even such as himself; and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divi-" ded amongst the vilest persons, lands taken from the chief men of the City; and all such burdens "and charges, as had been in times past common to all, he hath cast upon great personages of quali-"ty and worth, and fet up an affeffing or taxing, that the state of the wealthier perions being made K "known and exposed to envy, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and bestow their goods upon the poorest and neediest at his pleasure. Amidst this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful messenger in all halte. And presently began to cry out with a loud voice at the very porch or entry of the Curia: What is here ado, quoth he land what "meaneth this O Tarquinghow darest thou during my life, affemble the Senators or fit on my seat? Whereunt o he floutly made a proud answer that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being "as he was, a Kings son, he deemed himself more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a "bondflave: and as for him, he had been suffered long enough to play with his good Masters, and to infult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complices of both sides: the people they ran from all parts to the Councill-house, and like it was, that the stron- L

ger should be King. Then Tarquinus being put to his shifts, and forced to try the utmost, seeing no other remedy, took Servius by the middle, as being himself much yonger and stronger far, carried him our of the Council-house and threw him downfrom the stairs head to the foot, and so returned again into the Senate-house, to get the Senators together. The Kings Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled, Himfelf well near dead, with certain of his courtiers and train, breathless also for fear, made speed, and retired towards his Pallace, as far as to the top of Cyprius street, where Servins Tullins he was overtaken by them that were fent by Tarquinius, and so slain outright. And it is verily thought, that this was done by the fuggestion and procurement of Tullia; so little disagreeth it from other wicked pranks of hers, But this one thing is known for certainty, that the came riding in her coach into the common place of affembly, and nothing difmated or abashed at the presence M offo many men, there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-houle, and was the first that stiled him with the title of King. By whom she being willed to depart away out of that throng and uprore as the returned homward as far at the pitch of Cyprins freet, where was of late a place confecrated unto Diana, called Dianium, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the fleeds as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Virbius, for to pais up to the hill Efquilie, fuddenly staid for fear, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Mistris Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beaftly part, and beyond all fense of humanity, which the very place doth witness fill at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Vicus i.e. the wicked fireet: wherein the raging and frantick woman Tullia, hurried with the furies and haunted with the ghosts of her filter and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be N driven over her fathers dead corps; and being her felf besprinkled and beraied with the bloudy chariot, carried home with her some part of it in token and witness, that her hand was in this parricide and murder of her own father: to the end, that the might provoke her own domesticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure; and so consequently, as they entred their raign with mischief and wickedness, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infamy, Servius Tullius raigned four and fourty years, in such wife carrying himself, as it were hard, evenfor a good and staid Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings. And even that regiment of his to mild, for gracious, and temperate as it was : yet because it rested in the absolute power of one man, he was minded, as some do write, to have forgone and O > and cut off his good deligns and intent to let his country free. After him began to raign Tarquinius, for his infolent acts furnamed Superbus, i.e. the proud. For he would not fuffer his wives fartier (unkind fon in law he) to be interred: faying oftentimes in jibing manner, that Romulus also died and was never buried. Moreover, the principall heads of his Peers and Nobles, fuch (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took > given over had not this wicked intelline practile from his own family come between, to prevent

A part with him, those he made away and slew. Afterwards, searing upon the guitt of his own conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himself, attaining to the Crown so lewelly ; he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body : and in very truth, fetting only might alide, no other right had he to wear the diadem as who raigned neither by peoples election nor Senators approbation, Over and befides all this, to the end he might fit falely in his feat by fervile fear and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore feat by servile fear and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; to firike the greater terror into them, and hold them in awe, he by himfelf alone without affiftance of any countell, fate upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banift, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not those only whom he suspected and hated, B but also them, from whom he could look for nothing else but spoil. Thus when he had decaied the number of the nobles especially, he purposed to chuse no new in their place, for to make supply: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more ontemptible the whole order might grow : and with leis discontent put up the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advice, For this King was the first that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, & managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himself, and after his own waies; with whom it pleafed him he made war and peace, league and tociety, even of his own head: & would break the tame as himfelf thought good: thus he did, and undid all at his pleasure, without tegard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authority. Above all, he fought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latine na-C tion, that by support of forrain power also, he might be more secure and lafe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Princes friendship and amity only, but entred also into alliance and affinity with them. For unto Octavius Mamilius a Tusculan, he gave his daughter in marriage. This Mamilius was of all Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (if we may believe the common bruit and report) from Wyffes and Circe. By this marriage he gained may ny kinsfolk and friends of his new fon in law. So that now Tarquinins was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines, Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Ferentina, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither reforted they ingreat number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinine himself tailed not for his D part to keep the very day appointed but it was functing well near before he came. There, in that affembly all day long, before his coming, was truth talk and reasoning, pro & contra, touching him, Turnus Herdonius of Aricids, had in eighed spightfully against Tarquinius in his absence (for his Turnus Herdobeing away) faying, "It was no marvell indeed that he was at Rome furnamed Superbus (for even mushis Orabeing away) faying, a It was no marvell indeed that he was at Rome lumamed Superbus (for even mus in oration against then commonly they termed him fo, although fecretly, and in whitpering wife.) For could there Tanganius Suthe (quoth he) a prouder part plaid, than thus to mock delude, and abuse the whole state of Latipribus. "am, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appear, far from the Cities and dwel-44 ling houses; he only should be absent that summoned the assembly? Which verily was but a de-"vice of his to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke, he might keep them still under "as his vaffals: for who feeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the E . Latines, And in case his own Citizens have done well, in trusting him in the sule over them [if a iman may fay they truffed him, and not rather that he came foulely and forcibly by it even with "Thameful murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet I see " not why they fhould so do considering he is a meet stranger and alien. But how and if his own "subjects repens, and are discontented with him, being one after another by him murdered, bani-"fhed, deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and look "for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him they should depart home everyman and not keep "the day of the Dier no more than he dorn that published and proclaimed ir. Whilest this feditaous and dangerous person, who by these and such like factious courses was grown to be a great man and powerfull in his country, stood arguing thus, inforcing and following hard upon other F points, tending to the same effect, in cometh Tarquinius. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was fusht. Then turned every man to falure and welcome Tarquinus: Who after filence made (being advised by some of his tamiliars that were next unto him, to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day) faid that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or daielman between the father and the fone and because he was desirous and carefull to procure an attonement between them and to make them good friends: he made the longer flay and came the later. Which occafion of business seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to moveunto them, But Turnus (as they say) could not holdsoor put up formuch as this with filence: but brake out and faid again, there was no speedier deciding and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the ion; a thing that G might be dispatched in few words; for if he would not obey and give place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it with a mischief. And thus the Arieine having girded as it were, and glanced at the Roman King, departed out of the Affembly. Which thing Tarquinus taking more din eafantly a good deal than he made semblance of, forthwith devised and practiced to bring Arrans to his death, that he might strike the same terrour into the hearts of the Latines, wherewith he had kept under his own jubjects at home. And for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be flain, he framed most falfely a criminal! action against the guiltleis man; thereby wrongfully to work his destruction. By means of certain Aricians of a contrary faction, he H wrought a bondflave of Turnus with a fum of money, to fuffer a number of fwords privily to be conveyed into his Masters Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarquinius tomewhat before daysfent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were frighted by some strange accident, said," That his long tarrying the day to before, (by Gods speciall providence, as it were, so appointed) was for the safety of him and them "all, For he was informed that Turnus contrived to massacre both him and the heads of their na-"tion, to the end that he alone might raign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have " put this plot in execution, even in the very affembly; but the deed was deferred, for that him-"[elf (the principal) author of that meeting) whose life he sought for above all other, was not in I places and hereupon it was (saith he) that he sared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly "the day before in his absence; for that heby his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the " effect of his defigns: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the "morning at break of the day, so soon as they were set in Councill together, he would come ar-" med and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and fworn confederats: for reported it is, "(quoth he)that a number of words & other weapons are brought into his lodging which whe ther it be fo or no might foon be known. And there with he defired them to take the pains to go with him thither. And verily, confidering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Turnus, together with his yefterdaies Oration, and the long flay of Tarquinius befides, for that the pretended mal-facre feemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very infoicious and K pregnant, Thus go they with minds verily somewhat enclined and disposed to believe all, and yet fo, as they would think all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on every fide: and when they had laid hold upon his fervants, who for love of their Lord and Mafter began to make refistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostelry openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was apprehended and irons clapt upon him. And immediatly in all halte the Latines affembled together to councill in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon bringing forth the fwods in fight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer Tumus Herds- and plead for himself, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged L. down, and a hurdle done aloft upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarquinius then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of councill, and much commended them for duly executing Turnes, who practifing thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: "I "might (quoth he) if I would, by vertue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that for a much as all the "Latines are descended from Alba, they are comprised within that confederacy and league, "whereby in the raign of Tullusthe whole Commonweal and State of Alba, together with their "inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the com-"modity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the "Latines might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Roines, M

"rather than evermore to hazard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their Cities, with the spoiling and wasting of their lands, which first in Ancus daies they tasted, and after in my fa-"thers time they had abidden & fuffered. The Latines were herero foon perswaded. And although in that league the preheminence and foveraignty refted in the Romans, yet they faw well-enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation stood with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to fide with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and cross his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armour unto the grove of Ferentina. Who when they were there met together N from all parts according to the Edict of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Captain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themlelves to direct them, nor private engine diffinct from the rest to keep them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he fet Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain; nay, for martiall prowess he had been equall to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby stained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Volscians, which war Suessa Pometia after his time lasted more than 200 years: and wan from them by force Suessa Pometia. Where having made portfale of the pillage; and ratifed as much gold and filver as amounted to *40 talents; O he conceived in his mind to build fo flately a Temple of Jupiter as might before the foveraign King of gods and men, become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoil aforesaid. But presently upon this was he susprised with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vain upon Gabii, a neighbour City to Rome, and despairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town, quinius the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinius the Son at Gabes. Thus when he saw he had gathered strength sufficient, and was fully furnished against all assaies; he difpatched unto his father at Rome, one of his trufty fervants with credence, to know his will and pleafure, seeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To F this message made the King no answer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think for one hardly to be trufted. But as one musing with himself and in a deep study what answer to shape, he went into a garden on the back side of the house, and his sons messenger followed after. There walked he up and down, and faid never a word : only with his rod or walking staff, as if is reported, he knapt off the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger weary with talling for an answer, and waiting such attendance, returned to Gabes as wife as he came, and withour effect of his errand. He reported what he had faid and feen, namely, how the King, whether hoon anger or hatted or pride ingrafted by nature uttered no speech at all, But Sextus knowing by thele myflicall and fecret circumftances, his fathers will and direction, made no more ado but flew the chief of the Citizens: some by acculations unto the people, and others by reason of digrace G they were already in and thereby exposed unto violence, were soon overthrown. Many of them were openly executed, and some, whom there was little apparance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse were secretly murdered. Divers of their own accord fled into voluntary exile, or else they were forced into banishment; whose goods as well as theirs that were put to death, were divided among the people, By sweetness of this largess of spoil, by the profit and wealth that grew to Gabii surrens private persons; the publike woe and calamity was nothing telt and seen : untill such time as the dred to Tat-Gabins whole effare, despoiled of counsell, bereft of aid and fuccour, yeelded without dint of sword quinima unto the King of Rome.

Tarquinius having thus gained the town of Gales, made peace with the nation of the Equians, H and renued the league with the Tuscans. After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principall, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memoriall of his raign and name. That of two Tarquins, Kingsboth, it might be faid another day, that the father vowed it, and the fon finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions, might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chappels, which having been first vowed, by King Taim, in the very extremity of the battel against Romalus, were after by him confectated and hal-James in the very beginning and founding of which work, it is faid, that the divine power and I foveraign deity, moved the gods to declare the future mightiness of fo great an Empire. For when as the birds by figns out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chappels befides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous presage, and thus interpreted, That feeing the feat and house of Terminus was not firred, and he the god alone that was not displaced and called forth of the limits to him confectated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and currant: there followed another firange and prodigious fign, portending the greatness also of the Empire, For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared as they say, a mans head, sace and all, whole and found: which fight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold, that it should be K the chief Castle of the Empire, and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophefied the wizards, as well they of the City, as tho'e whom they fent for out of Tufcan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly fet upon sumptuous building, and spared for no cost. So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therfore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pitter (to fay nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but *40 talents, and no more, than to Pifo, who writeth, that there was *40000 7,000 lifterl. pound weight of filver fet by for that we, Which ium or mass of money could never be looked for to arise out of the saccage of one only City in those daies: and must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of thesestately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being L thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Tufcan, employed not only the Cities money and flock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people with all. Which was no small toil of theirs, confidering the travell of warfare befides: yet were they lels agrieved and discontented therewith, fo long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortall gods. But afterwards were they employed and fet to other works, which as they were less in thew to were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely the making of scaffolds or standing-places in the Cirque or Theater; and to the conveyance of a mighty great finke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, carcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect com- M parable. Having in this wife held the commons in continual labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and peffer the City, when they were not employed fome way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confines of his Dominions, he therefore sent part of them to inhabit and people Signia and Circeii, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land. Whilest he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and searfull sight, namely, a ferpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flie into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentany fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchars and wise men of Tuscan about N publike prodigious tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this searfull fight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person : purposed to fend out as far as D. Iphi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatall lots, he addreffed two of his fons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more unknown leas into Greece. Titus and Aruns were they that went this journey, having to bearthem company all the way, L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the Kings fifter, 2 young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death; to the intent that himself might have nothing lest, either in O the parts of his mind for the King to fear, or in his outward flatefor him to covet and defire: refolved under the cloak of bale contempt to fave himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no sasegard at all. And therefore composing and staming himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an eicheat, he refuied notto be milnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures ; that under the shadow & colour of that surname, that courage of his lying close hid,

A which should one day set free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due seafon, This Brutus being by the Tarquins brought to Delphi, as their laughing flock to make them passime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men fay.) for to offer and present unto Apollo a golden rod within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow tor the purpole: the very type and resemblance by secret circumstances, of his natural disposition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very defixous and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome, And from the bottom of the deep Vault, this aniwer, as men lay, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (Oyoung men) shall first kifs your mother, he shall bear chief and soveraign rule in Rome.] B The Tarquins then intending that Sextss their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the answer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, willed the matter should by all possible means be carried to fecret as might be, and concealed from him, They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should first kils his mother, But Brutus supposing the speech of Apollo his Priest, tended to another sense, made as though hestumbled forward and took a fall; and io touched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himself, that she was common mother of all mortal men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rutilians. The Rutilians then were Lords of Ardea, A people in those parts, and for those times, very rich didea befieged and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of war. The by the Romans C Roman King was defirous both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptuous building of publike works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his naturall inbjects : being much discontented (besides their generali missike of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government; and disdaining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to servile toil and painfuli labour. The Romans affaied at the reginning to surprise and win Ardea by affault : but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and diffress the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and fabricks about the town. During this fiege, and the standing camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly, when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruell) there were granted large licenses and pasports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and D yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Souldiers. And the Kings fons had otherwhile good leisure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whiles they were drinking and making merry with Saxtus Tarquinius in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinius the fon of Egerius lat at supper; there arole among other good table-talk, some arguing about their wives; whiles every man highly praised and wondroully commended his own. And growing to some heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for infew hours it may be known how far my Lucretia furpaffeth all the reft. The flory of And therefore if there be any luftinels and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horie-dame Lucreita. back, and in our own perions go and fee the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shall be found and sen, taken of a sudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, so let eve-E tyman judge of them, and let that down for the only triall of this controversie. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily heat with wine : Mary, content fay they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the four to Rome. Thirther were they come by the shutting in of the evening when it grew to be dark; and fo forward without any flay to Collatia they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings fons wives, whom they had suprised and seen afore, passing the time away in feasing and rioting with their minions and companions: but fitting up far within the night in the midst of her house amongs her maidens, hard at wooll-mendation refled in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquins had a loving and courteous welcom at her hands. And he again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings ions kindly and made p them friendly cheare, There at that instant Sextus I arquinius was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton luft; for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chastity fer him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disported themselves all night long like lusty and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinius, unwitting to Collatinus attended with one only maneame to Collatia, where he was again in good and friendly for received by them in the house, that suspected nothing less than that whereabout he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him sure, and that every body was failt afleep, all fer on fire and burning in love, he steppeth with naked fword in hand to Lucretia, as The lay fleeping full foundly, and bearing down the womans breft with his left hand, Peace (quoth The) Lucreria & not a word: I am Sexus Tarquinius, I have my drawn (word in handiff thou once speak thou shalt furely die. The filly woman thus starting out of sleep was fore affright, as see-

Then uttered Tar-mining and confessed his amorous passion, sell to carreat and entreat again, and with his prayers intermedled threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all means to fit, to found and tempt the womans heart. But when he saw her obstinate and invincible, and (to diefor it) not relenting one jot; then, besides the sear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame :

pretending that after he had mailacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own man- H fervant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that the was taken and killed in filthy Lugnia forced adultery. For rear of this reproach and infamy, see how sinful lust gar the victory, and conquered by Taquinus constant chastity; and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by assault won the fort of a womans honour, departed thence, But wofull Lucretia, all forrowing for fo heavy a milchance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and trusty friend, and hereof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible, So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretisus her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the fon of Volesus: and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by I chance going back to Rome, encountred in the way his wives messenger. Lucretia they found itting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and fad: and she at the coming of these her dearest friends, shed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? "No God wot fir, "(quoth she again:) For how can ought be well with a woman that is despoiled of her honour "and womanhood? The print, Collatinus, of another man is to be seen in thy own bed, Howbeit, "my body only is distained my mind and heart remaineth yet unspotted and that my death shall "make good and justifie. But give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promife that the "adulterer shall not elcape unpunished, Sex. Targuinius is the man, he it is, who this night past, entertained as a friend, but indeed a very toe in the highest degree, hath by force and violence taken from hence with him his pleafure, a deadly pleafure, I may lay, to me : and to himfelf also no less, K

Tarquinius the proud and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood of his children, and fuffer neither him nor any else for his sake to raign as King at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so strange occurrent, and wondring how it came to pals, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and become so flout of flomack and couragious, took the same form of oath that he sware afore and fo leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly fet upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and ut- M. terly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the market place, and there shewed. And thither, what with wondring (as the manner is)at so strange a fight, and what with the indignation of io unworthy a fact, they raifed much people together.

Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the Kings blond, The forrow of Lucretius the father on the one fide, the resolution of Brutus on the other fide, who rebuked and blamed all vain weeping and foolish moaning, moved and perswaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms against them that demeaned themselves no better, nay, worse than ordinary enemies, And presently, the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. The rest of the youths followed streight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in N gatrison, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the King and his fons, of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. At the fudden coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principal Citizens in the forefront, they judged whatfoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. He reckoned "up also and put them in mind of the unworthy death and cruell murder of Servius Tullius: and "how his daughter (oh abominable act !) rode over the corps of her father in her curfed chariot: "And herewith he calleth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents. Thus rehearing these and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (1 verily beleeve) according as the present indignity at the very time doth minister and givent terapte for, not so easily B penned and fet down by writers that come after, he fo mightily inflamed the multitude, that he cansed them to depose the King, to deprive him of hisroyall state and dignity, yea, and to decree and enach, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himself having selected and armed the younger gallants who offered their service, and willingly entred their names, fet forward in person to the Camp lying before Ardea, for to excite the Army there against the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucretius, who had before been appointed Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King, In this time of garboile, Tullia left the palace and fled, and all the way as the went, both men and women curied and cried out upon her, and belought the ghoftly spirits and suries of parents to be avenged. When news hereof was brought into the Camp, and that the King upon these strange tidings made haste towards Rome, to stay and suppress these C broyls: Brutus having intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meet with him. And so at one instant in a manner by contrary journies came Brutus to Ardea, and Tarwan mu, and to at the material water that against Tarquinus, and instead of entrance, warned he Rungbandhed was, and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their City, From thence were also the Kings sons driven: two of them followed after their sather and departed into banishment unto Care, a town of the Tuscans: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired himself to Gabes as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old quarrels, upon malice and harred of the people which he had brought upon himself in times past, L.Tarquinius Superbus raigned 25 years, Thus continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a solemn D affembly and election by the Centuries, held by the Provost of the City, according to the ordinance of Servius Tullius in his Commentaries, two Confuls were created: L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus. The Second Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome. The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Second Book.

PRutus took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to raign King at Rome, He compel-led his follow Confull Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with the Tarquins, by reason of the assumption of the suspect of the King and his sons be commanded to be served upon and risked. A sield of their he consecrated to Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mars field, He beheaded certain joung Genr tlemen of the Nobility sogether with his own and his brothers sons, for conspiring to receive the King and his Complices again into the City. Umo the bonds are Vindicius, that bear syed the complot, he gave his freedom, of whom Vindista took the name. Having led as Army against the King who had affembled a power of Veientians and Tarquinians, and made war, he died in battell together with Atuns, the fon of Superbus : and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whol: year. P. Valerius the Confutpropounded and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitoll was dedicated. Porfe-na King of the Clutins, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquins, and being come to the Janiculum, was by the valour of Cocles Horatius, empeached that he paffed not the Tyber: who alone, whiles others hewed down the Sublician bridge, with food the Tuicans: and when it was broken down, leapt armed as he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows. Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius, G who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Poriena, and having stain his principall Secretary, whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and thrusting his hand into the fire of the Altars, whereupon they had burued sacrifices, suffered it there to fry untill it was consumed: and suit withall, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworn the death of the King himself. Who wondring at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upon taking of hoflagesto give over war: among ft whom, one virgin Clockia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and swam over Tyber to her friends: and being rendred again, was by Possena fent honorably home, and had her statue or image on horseback, set up for a memoriall. Ap. Claudius abandoned the Sabins, and fled H to Rome, of whom the Tribe Clausia took the name, and was added to the rest. The number of tribes was encreafed to be one and twenty. Against Tarquinius Superbus, who with a power of Latines waged war, A. Polihumius the Distator, obtained a prosperous battell at the lake Regillus. The Commons rising, for being enthralled unto their Creditors, retired themselves into the mount Sacer, and were by the policy and counfil of Menenius Agrippa, reclaimed from their fedition, and appealed. The same Agrippa being deceased was by reason of his poverty, buried at the Cities charge. There were created five Tribunes of the Commons. Cotioli, a town of the Volicians was taken by the valour and industrious means of Cn Martius, who thereupon was surnamed Coriolanus. T. Latinus, a mean Commoner, was warned in a dream to make relation to the Senate of certain religious ceremonies: and for neglecting the same, lost his son, I and fell himself to be lame of his limbs, and being brought in the Senate in a chair, after he had deckared the same, returned sound on his feet kome again, Cn. Martius Coriolanus, afier he was banished, became Generall of the Volicians, and with an Army of enemies approached the City of Rome : unto whom, fi ft Eml affedors were of surpose fent, and afterwards the Priests and whole Clergy perswaded with him, n.t to make war against his native Countrey, but all in vain. Howbeit Veturia his mother, and Volumnia his wife entreated him and obtained, that he should depart back again. The Law Agraana vocation of lands among the poor Commonts was now fift put up and proposed. Sp. Califus an Alderman after be had been Conful was condemned for aspiring to be King, and suffered death therefore. Oppia a Vest. Il Nun was for incest buried quick. Against the Vestentians sear enemies and ill meighborsyst indied troublesome than noisome and dangerous the house alone of the Fabii, requiredto be employed in service: and set out three hundred and six armed men to the field, who every one were by the enemies flain near the river Cremera, and left lut one only at home alive of that name, under fourteen years of age. Ap. Claudius the Conful having fought unfortunately against the Volicians, and that, by means of the stubbornness and unruliness of his Army, cudgelled every tenth man of his fouldiers. The Second Book of T. Livius.

Ow will I def ribe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of L Rome, a free state now from this time forward: their yearly Magistrates and Governours: the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the last Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other Kings before him, they raigned fo, as that they might be counted all of them, and that worthily, builders of fundry parts of the City one after another, according as they every one by himself added thil one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreased to inhabit, Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very same Brutus, who delerved so great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquin, should have done the same to the exceeding danger of the weal publike, iffor defire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wrefted the royall cignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that communalty M confilting of herdmen and fugitive strangers, rejorting out of their own countries there to dwell, having under protection of a fanctuary and priviledged place gotten liberty, or at leastwife impunity; being now freed and past fear of a royall Majesty, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the ruffling storms and seditions tempests of the Tribuns and in a new and strange City fown debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the surest pledges of wives and children, the dearest affection of the very place and soil, which requiresh long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certainly, the state not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by discord saded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cherished and softered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to that pais, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and bear N the good and whollom fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you must account in regard hereof, That the Consulary regiment was annual and from year to year rather than that the royall power and jurisdiction that the Kings had, was any whit abated and diminished. For the first Consuls had the same absolute authority, held all the former royalties, and retained still the regall enfigns and ornaments of supreme dignity. This only provided that they should not both have the rods born before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majesty. Brutus with the good liking and consent of his companion in office, had the preheminence and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a fure maintainer and protector of the same. And first above O all other things, whilest the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear lest they might any time after be won by entreaty or moved by gifts on the Kings part, he cauled them to sweat that they would never suffer any to be King at Rome. After this, because the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreated their number (which had been impaired much by massacres, committed by the said King) to the full complement of three hundred: by chung the chief and principall of the degree of A Knights or horsemen. And hereof came, as they say, this custome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and also those that were newly chosen for the supply: naming these that were last enrolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they went in hand with Religion and Church-matters : and for that there were certain publike facrifices that had been usually executed by the Kings themselves in their own perfons: left therefore they should not find the mils of Kings in any respect, nor long after them again they create of purpole a King-Priest or facrificer: which facerdotall dignity they ordained to Be under the Arch-Prelate, left that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a speciall regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I think verily they went beyond all measure, and were over-precise in the maintenance and strengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toics of no moment. For when as nothing else was offensive unto them, the name for looth of one of their Consuls became suspected and odious unto the City, without any other scandall whatioever. And thus they muttered and faid," That the Tarquinis had raigned over-long, and too much already: that Prifess first "began, and when after him succeeded King Servius Tullius, Superbus Tarquinius not having in that "time and space between, forgot the Kingdom, as seeing another invested therein; by wicked " practice and violence claimed and recovered the same again, as the inheritance properly to his "house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is de-"volved unto Collatinus, and there refleth. These Tarquins belike (say they) cannot skill how to "live as private, men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free State, and in "one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whispered abroad throughout all the City, by them that under-hand founded by little and little the hearts and dispofitions of men and when these surmises & sulpitions were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Bruius called them to a generall assembly. "Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the flock and house of the Targains, the "Kings rule and government will likewife void and depart for ever. The Conful at this io strange and fudden a motion first wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addressed himselfand began to make a speech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers belought the fame at his hands, As for all the reflected prevailed full little with him. But after that Sp. Lucreius a more grave and elder man than himself, of greater worth aloretime, and his father in Law befides, took him in hand and dealt with him fundry wates, one while by way of intreaty, otherwhiles by periwasions and reasons, that he would condescend unto that F-which the City in one general content required: then the Conful fearing left hereafter being once out of his place and a private man again, he should chance to beforced thereunto, with the loss of his goods and some diigrace perhaps belides; refigned up the office of the Consulfhip, and remowing all that he had away to Lammum quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and detree of the Senate, proposed unto the people, That all the race and linage of the Tarquins should be exiled. And in agenerall Session of the Centuries, he created for to be his Colleague in government, P. Valerius, by whose affistance he had driven out the Kings.

No man doubted now that the Tarquins were about to take arms: yet that war hapned not fo foon as men looked for: but see (a thing that no man seared) they had like by fraud and treason at home to have left and forgone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Rome, certain of young Gen.

As for laws, they are H "things deaf and inexorable: more wholfome and commodious to the poor than to the rich and "mighty, affording no release nor pardon, if one chance to trespais and transgress : And a ticklish " point it is and perilous for a man among lo many errours whereto our frainty is subject, to bear "himlelf only upon his innocent lite, Being thus of their own accordalready discontent, suddenly unlooked for there came Embassadors from the Kings, who without any mention at all of return, demanded only their goods again. Upon their message being delivered and heard in the Senatehouse, this debate and question held them for certain daies in councill, fearing lest that the goods not restored might minister occasion of quarrell, and being rendred, yield maintenance and nourishment of war. In the mean time the Embassadours dealt and treated with divers persons di- I verily: in open shew, claiming only their goods, but secretly and under-hand, contriving how to compais the Kingdom for their Masters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accomplishment of that which they pretended, and was in question, they founded oftentimes the minds of certain noble young Gentlemen, how they flood affected to their defignments. Whose words and reasons were of them gently entertained; and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tarquins, and withall conferred together, and practifed the receiving of the Kings privily by night into the City. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Vitellii and Aquilii, that were brethren. Alifter of the Vuellii was married unto the Conful Brutus, by whom he had two fons that were young men, Titus and Tiberius, whom their uncles by the mothers fide made partakers with them likewise of their counsell. Besides, there were divers K young Gentlemen (whose names long time hath worn out quite) made acquainted therewith In this mean featon, their opinion in the Senate-house prevailed, who thought it best that the goods should be restored: and the Embassadours upon that occasion made stay in the City, for that they had gotten time of the Consuls to provide carriage for to have away the Kings stuff, and other movable goods. All that time spent they in consulting with the Conspirators, and so importunately laboured them untill they had procured their letters also unto the Tarquinis: for otherwise (fay they) how will they believe but that their Embassadours make wrong report of matters so important. The giving of those letters in pledge of their truth and plain meaning, proved to bewray and reveal their purposed enterprise. For the day before the Embassadours were to take their leave, and return to the Tarquins, they fortuned to lup with the Vitelii: and whileft the confpira- L tors there, were in fad and close talk together, conserring at large about this new devised practife, and no man by but only themselves (as the manner is;) a certain bondslave chanced to overhear them, one that before had an inckling whereabout they went, but waited the opportunity when the letters frould be given to the Embaffadours, which being found upon them, might directly prove the treafon. This flave after he underflood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Confuls: who immediatly departed from their houses to take the Embassadours, and the Conspirators in the manner, and without any stir or tumult light upon them unawares, and dashed all. But of the letters they had a speciall care, that they should be forth-coming and not The confpiramiscarry. And committing the traitors forthwith to prison, they made some pause and doubt acy detected. bout the Embassadors, what to do with them. For albeit, they seemed to have deserved no less M but to be used as enemies, and to have no favour at all, yet had they regard to thelaw of Nations. Now concerning the Kings goods, which they thought meet before to be reftored, the matter came about wholly in question again before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied flatly the rendring of them, yea, and forbad they should be confiscate and converted to the common treasury: but they were given away among the Commons to make spoil and havock thereof: to the end, that they having one touched or feifed on the Kings goods as a booty, might for ever after bepaft all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tar-Campus Marti- quinslying between the City and Tyber, was confectated unto Mars, and after called Campus Mars tii,i.e. Mars field. It hapned (as men fay) that there was at that time flanding corn there; now ripe and ready for the harvest: which crop of ground, because they made some scruple of consei-N ence otherwise to consume, therefore it was cut down, corn, straw, stubble and all, and a great number of people sent thither at once to carry it away in baskets and skeps, and pour it down the Tyber, running then but shallow, as it useth to do in the midst and heat of Summer. And so the heaps of corn, together with the mud fluck ftill and refted in the ebbe places and foords of the river: and by little and little encreased with one thing or other than came down the stream untill it became an Island, Afterwards, I suppose, there were dams and piles made thereunto, and by mans hand it grew so high, and so firm a piece of ground, that it was able to bear even Temples and stately Galleries that stood thereupon.

When the Kings goods were thus spoiled, risled, and made away, the traitors were condemned and put to death. Which suffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father by his place O & vertue of his office was bound and charged to see execution done upon his own own children: and he who otherwise ought not to have been a spectator and looker on, even he (such was his fortune) was forced of necessity to be the principall actor in this tragical execution. Then food these most noble youths bound fast to a stake. But among all, the Consul his children, turned upon them the eyes of every man, from all the rest, as unknown persons and of no reputation; all men pitied them, not so much for being punished, as for deserving by their fact to be punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thought, to betray into the hands of Tarquinius, fometimes a proud Prince, and then a cruell enemy, and banished into the hands of Targumus, sometimes a productime, and then a truell enemy, and bandhed rebell, their native country, lately and in that very year fet free from captivity: their natural father who let it free: the Confulthip forung first out of the family of the Janu: the Nobles, the ther who let it tree: the Commons, and in one word, all things whatfoever in Rome belonging either to God or man, Commons, and in one word, all things whatfoever in Rome belonging either to God or man, The trainers Then came the Confuls forth, took their places and fet them down on the tribunal lifeat. The Lichors were fent to do their office, who hift firipped them naked and icoursed them with rods, and then with an axe chopt off their heads. All which time, the father himself, his countenance Brutus putterh and vifage was a wonderfull spectacle to behold, considering how a fathers affection could hold to death his Bout and abide the performance of this publike and exemplary punishment. When the offenders ownchildren. had once luffered, to the end there might be shewed noble examples on both sides, for to debar wickedness, and flop the course of fin: the informer and revealer of treason, had for his reward a peece of money out of the common treasury, obtained his freedom, and was enfranchised a Cirizen of Rome. This was the first man, as they say that was made free by the rod Vindita: for that the party his name was Vinditius, from whence, as some think, the word Vinditia was derived: after whom, this was observed, That whosoever in that fort got their freedom, were supposed

These suggestions moved the Veientians, and everyman for himself muttered and gave out in threatning wife, that now at length, having a Roman Captain especially to be their Leader, they were to do away the foul dishonours sustained, and win Eagain what by former war they had loft. As for the Tarquinians, they were soon incited in regard of name and confanguinity, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to have of their own name and house to be Kings of Rome. Thus two armies of two Cities banded with Tarquin, for to restore him to his Kingdom again, and to make sharp war upon the Romans: who being entred the Territory of Rome, were met with by the Roman Confuls, The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshalled in a battallion sour iquare, Brutus with the horse went before to espy and discover the coasts: In like fort the men of arms of the enemies rode formoft under the leading of Aruns Tarquinius the Kings (on, and the King himself in person sollowed with the Legions. Aruns espying by the Lictors, the Consul as ar off, and as he approached nearer, knowing Brutus more certainly by his tace, all inflamed with ire: F" This is the Gallant (quoth he) this is he, that hath driven and banished us out of our native

Now help ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to Kings: and therewithall fet spurs to his horse, and ran amain with full carreer upon the Consul his own person intending certainly to speed him. Brutus perceived likewise that he made directly toward him: (Now was it a noble and worthy fight for the Captains themselves to begin the battell,) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountreth him. And so sercelythey charged one another, and so deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to save himself, so he might wound and michief his enemy, but were both with a counterpush that quite pier ed their targets runinto the fides, and thrust through, and so having one anothers lance sticking in their bodies, G fell from their hories ready to dye. Herewith began on both fides the other horiemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched and the battell so indifferently fought; that it was very doubtfull whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and down went the left. The Veientians, unto whom The Veientians it was no news to be overcome of Romans, were discomfitted and put to flight. But their new e- deteated by nemies the Tarquinians, not only held their own and flood to it, but also from their battell put the Romans. back, and forced the Romans to give ground, and gave them the repulse. After this conflict there fell fuch a fear and terrour upon Tarquinius, and the Tuscans, that both Armies as well of the Vei-H entians as the Tarquinians, gaveover their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night dislodged and departed every man to his own home. This battell was more notable by realon of certain miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at reft, there was heard a mighty voice of Sylvanu (as men thought) out of the wood Arfia to utter their words, That there was flaine on the Tuscant part more by one, and that the Romans won the field.] Thus verily and no otherwise departed they alunder: the Romans as winners, and the Tulcans as having the worle. For the next morrow, fo foon as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in fight, P. Valerius the Conful gathered up the spoil together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funerals of his brother Conful, in all fump- I tuous manner and solemn pomp, as possibly at that time he could devise, But, that which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publike forrow and heaviness of the City, in this respect above all singular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrons of Rome mourned a whole year for him, as for their own father, in that he had been so sharp a revenger of violence done to

After this, the Consulthat survived, presently upon the great liking and savour that he was in (see how wavering and unconstant the minds are of the common people) was not only envied, but also suspected, yea, and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruited it was abroad that he aspired to the Crown, And why? because, for sooth, he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Conful in the room of Brutue: and began to build aloft on the top of Velia, K where (saythey) in an high place and strongly scituate he may make a Castle impregnable, These things commonly spoken and credited too, vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consul in his very loule, as a great indignity offered unto him. Whereupon he affembled the people together, & cauling the rods to be held downwards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That fight pleased the people passing well, taking it for a plain demonstration, that the marks and enfigns of rule and government lubmitted unto them, was a very acknow-P. Valerius the ledging and consession that the people was of greater majesty and power than the Consul, Where after filence made, and commandment to hearken and give ear, "the Conful began highly to ex-"toll the fortune and good hap of his Colleague deceased, who having with great honour set his "Country free, ended his daies, fighting manfully in defence of the Weal-publike, even in the L " prime, height, and best time of his glory, ere that he became subject unto envy : but he himself "outliving it, remained alive, exposed unto criminous slanders and spightfull malice of men, and "of a deliverer and redeemer of his Countrey was now reputed no better than the Aquilii and "Pitchi, And willyon never indeed (quoth he) approve the vertuous and honeft convertation of "a man fo well, but it hall be tainted with unjust suspicion? Well, P. Valerius his house shall be no hindrance or "impeachment unto your liberty, O Quirites, ye shall not need to fear any harm from Velia for me. "I will remove my housenot only down into the plain, but even to the valley under the hill foot, "that you may dwell aboveme, and overlook me (a suspessed Citizen.) Let them a gods name "build in Velia, who may be better trusted with the Cities freedom than P. Falerius. Then was immediatly the timber and all carried down beneath Velia, and where as now Vicus Publicus is, in the very bottom of the hill, was his house reedified.

After this were laws enasted, which not only acquit the Conful and cleared him of all suspition of affecting to the Kingdom, but also contrariwise wrought such effect, that he became ex-N ceeding popular again, whereupon he was furnamed Publicola or Poplicola. And first and formost named Publice- the Statute passed as touching the appeal unto the people, against the Rulers and Magistrates, Item, concerning the curing and condemning of him both body and goods, that should intend or plot to usurp Princely dominion over them. Thele acts the Commons liked well of, Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praise might be his therefore, then assembled he a generall Session for the substituting of another Conful unto him, in the room of his Colleague departed. So, Sp. Lucretius was created Conful: who being an aged man and of great years feeble withall and not able to execute the office and function of a Conful, within few daies paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Lucretius was M. Horatius Pulvillus chosen, In some ancient writers I do not find that Lucretius was Conful. For immediatly after Brutus they make O mention of Horstins. But I think verily because no act of his made his Consulship memorable thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll dedicated And when Valerius and Horatius the Confuls, cast lots whether of them twain should perform that duty, the charge fell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forthto the Veientian war. But the kinsfolk and friends of Valerius took it more grievously and impatiently than realon was, that the honor of the dedication of fo famous a temple, was given unto Horatius. Devising

A Deviling therefore by all means possible they could, to impeach it, and seeing they had assaied all in vain and nothing took effect: even at the very instant, whiles the Conful was holding a post of the Temple, and in his folemn prayers to the gods, behold they brought unto him heavy and wofull news, that his ion was dead, and that he might not lawfully, whiles his houshold mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, confectate the Temple. Whether it were that he gave no credit to the messenger, or rather was of heart so stout, neither is it for certain reported, nor easie for a man to divine. But for all their tidings, never a jot was he turned from his purpole, nor taid ought elie to the messenger, but willed that he should bid the corps to be had forth to butiall, and so holding the pillar or post still said out his prayer, and dedicated the Temple. These were the acts B doneboth at home and abroad in the first year after the expulsion of the Kings.

Then were P. Valerius the second time, and T. Lucretius created Confuls, By this time were the Tarquins fled for succour to Lartes Porfena King of Clusium: "where, by many reasons and re-"montrances, intermineled with prayer, one while they befought him not to fuffer them, delten-"ded from the Tuscans, of the same bloud and name, to live needy and forlorn in perpetuall exiles otherwhile they advised and warned him not to put up without revenge this new fashion of expelling Kings, now comming up. Saying, that liberty in it self had sweetness enough: and un-"lels Kings would defend and maintain their Crowns with as great might and main, as Cities " defired to enjoy freedom, there would be a general confusion, and all things turned upfide down: " neither would there be in States and Common wealths any thing aloft and eminent above o-C "ther endured: whereupon would iffue a final end of Kingly regiment, a thing with God and

"man of all other most excellent and beautiful, Porfena supposing it would be an honourable matter unto the Tuscans, both to have a King at Rome, and a King too of the Tuscans line, ame with a cruell army against Rome. Never was the Senate at any time afore put in such fear: so mighty in Porfnable those daies was the puissance of Clusium, and the name of Porfens to renowned. Moreover, they flegeth Rome. feared not their enemies only, but allotheir own subjects at home, lest peradventure the Communalty of Rome for fear of war should receive the King into the City, and accept of peace, though it cost them their liberty. During which time the Gommons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindness, and many favours and courtefies they had at their hands. And above all things order was taken for provision of grain and victuals. And for to purvey store of corn, some were D fent to the Vosfei, others to Cumes. Over and besides the licence of selling salt, because it was fold at an exceeding high price, was taken from private falters, and was undertaken by the City, with all the coft and charges thereto belonging by them defraied, and falt delivered out to the people at an easie reckoning. The Commons were also freed of portage, tollage, and tribute; and rich men that were able to bear the burthen were a flessed at all paiments and contributions: the poor were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind dealing and indulgency of the Nobles kept the City afterwards (notwithstanding their hard diffrels of fiege and famine) in such concord and unity, that the meanest as well as the highest abhorred and detefied the name of KK. And never after was there any one private perion, fo popular, fo devoted to the people by crafty means and indirect couries tending to their particu-E lar defigns, as the whole Senate was at that time, by their good government of the Commonweal. Now when the enemies approached near shand, every man made shift for himself, for fook the Country and came into the City. Which they fortified with strongguards round about: so that what with wals and bulwarks on the one fide, and what with the Tyber on the other fide, it feemed fure enough, and fufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man been, even Horarins Cocles (who that day by the That are forgood fortune of the Romans was a fortrefs unto the City of Rome.) He as good hap was, ap titude of Ho pointed to ward and keep the bridge feeing the Janicle by a fudden affault won, and that the cuemies ran. down fo furioufly from thence upon him, & contrariwile, the mukitude of his own companies for feat, to forgotheir weapons, break their arraies, and to be gone took hold of every man, F opposed himself against them asront: and calling God and man to witness, protested, shewed and declared unto them, that for aking and abandoning thus their quarter, all their flying was but in vain: for if they left the bridge on their backs, to yield pallage to the enemies, there would anon be more of them in Palatium and the Capitol than in the Janicle; and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea, and gave them direction to break down the bridge, by hewing, by firing, or by what means they possible could: affuring them for his own part, so much as the body of one only man was able to do, he would receive, and withstand the violence of the enemies. Then advanceth he himfelf unto the first entry or foot of the bridge, and all goodly to be feen, amongst those that would in no point fight, but shewed their backs, he so bent his sword and target in their very faces, resolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his G wonderfull hardiness and incredible courage, he aftonied and amazed his enemies. Howbeit, two there were that for very shame tatried still and stood to him, namely, Sp. Largius and Tit, Herminisu, brave men both, as well for noble birth as worthy deeds. Affilted for a while with thele gallants, sustained he the first storm of danger and most cumber ome push of the skirmish. But as they that were having down the bridge called upon them to come back, he conftrained those two also to retize and save themselves, whiles some little part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut, Then casting all about in menacing manner his fiery and terrible eyes towards the Captains

I be second Book of T. Livius. and principals of the Tuscans, one while he challenged them one by one to single fight: other-H whiles he rated them all in generall calling them the hirelings and flaves of proud Kings and tyrants; who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppugn and impeach the liberty of others. The enemies flood at a bay and in suspence a good while, looking about them one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, very shame made the whole troup to flir and come forward and to fetting up a loud cry, from all fides they let flie their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy. All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target, and there fluck, and nevertheless with full resolution kept the bridge flill. walking his stations, and stalking like a giant. Then assaied they with all their force to bearthe man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time the crack of the bridge broken I under him, and the shout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finished their work, staid with fudden fear their violent affault. Then praied Cocles in this wife: "O father Tiberinus (quoth "he) O facred river, with devout heart I thee befeech, receive with thy gracious and mercifull fiream this harness, these weapons, and this thy fouldier. And so all armed as he was, he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he fwam over and escaped safe to his sellows. A brave adventure for all posterity another day to talk of, rather than to beleeve. For this fo great fortitude and resolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was fet up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compals, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongst these publike avours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wils of private persons K also well appeared: for in that extream want and scarcity that then was, every man out of his house-store and provision spared from himself, and for to give him one thing or another destanded his own belly. Thus Porfena with the repulse of this his first enterprise, changed his mind from affaulting to befieging of the City: and after he had placed a garnion in the Janiculum, he planted himself and encamped on the plain, even upon the banks of the Tyber. And fending for boats and craiers from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of Tyber, that no corn should come in and be conveyed to Rome: and also that the fouldiers, as they faw occasion might cross the river, and fetch booties in divers and fundry places at their pleafure in fhort space he brought the whole countrey about Rome to such streights, that not only other things were brought in, but all their cattel also was fain to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durst put any creature L forth out of the gates. The Tuscans were permitted to be thus bold, not so much for fear as for a policy: for Valerius the Conful, waiting for some vantage and opportunity, suddenly to set upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they stragled abroad disorderly, making little regard to revenge small matters kept himself to be revenged of them throughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth their forragers, and toll them abroad, he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should pur their cattel forth at the gate Efquilina, which was farthest from the enemies : supposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reason that in this extremity of long siege and pinching hunger, some false knaves and disloyal rogues would flie unto them. And so feil it out indeed; For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive flave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes pass M over the river, in hope to make a general spoil and havock once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a sufficient company to lie close in ambush at two miles end, in the Sabine high way, and Sp. Largius with a power of lufty tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Collina, untill the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himself between the river and them, and so to intercept them in their return. The other Consul T. Lucretius iffued forth with certain bands of footmen at the gate Navia: and Valerius himself in proper perfon fet forthfrom mount Calins certain enfigns of his best and choice fouldiers. These first were des ried and discovered by the enemy, Herminius so soon as he heard some noise and stir, arose and ran at once out of the ambush, and whilest the Tuscans turned to set upon Lucraius, he charged them lustily at their backs: fo that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one fide, N and from the gate Navia on the other, the allarm was given. Thus the robbers were flain and cut in pieces in the midft of them : both for that they were overmatched in fight and also became all the waies were flopped up, that they could not escape by way of flight. And never after durft the Tufcans range about the countrey to audactoully. Howbeit, the fiege continued neverthelets, with great farcity of corn, and exceeding dearth within the City. And Porfena had good hope by fitting fill, to force it in the end, and he master thereof. At what time one C. Matins a noble young gentleman, who thought it a dishonour and foul shame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under Kings, were in no war nor by any enemies beleaguered, should now, being the same still in time of their freedom, be of these Tuscans besieged, whose armies they often had defeated: and supposing that by some hardy and adventurous piece of service O this reproachfull indignity was to be revenged, devised at first on his own head to enter into the enemies Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Consul and the knowledge of any other person, lest peradventure he might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traiterous runnagate, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep furbition; and to be reputed for no better: preferred himfelf before the Council into the Senate house: "Et I am right willing, and I have a purpose

A "my LL. (quoth he) to pais over the Typer, yea, and if I can, to enter the Camp of the enemies, "not in quality of a robber, nor to be revenged for booties from us taken, with doing the fem-"blable. A greater exploit with the favour of the gods, I intend to perform. The Senators gave their consent, and approved his designment, Then with a skein, hidden under his garment, he settethforward. Being thither come into the Camp, he preffeth in the thickest throng to stand near the Kings Tribunal. It fortuned that then and there the fouldiers were receiving their pay. And the Chancellor, or Kings principal Secretary fate together with the King in like array, much employed and bussed in many matters, and the souldiers commonly had recourse unto him. Mating tearing to enquire whether of them two were Porfena left by not knowing the King he should be-B wray himself who he was, hapned (see how fortune in her rashness directed his hand) to kill the Secretary inflead of the King: then as he paffed through the teatful multitude, making himself way with his bloudy blade, there was a present outcry, and thereat the Kings guard came running in, laid hold othim, and brought him back before the King his royal Throne: and albeit he was now forforn and without all in cour amidst those threats of frowning for time, yet as a man more feared till than fearing: "I am (queth he) a Citizen of Rome, and Cains Mutius is my name. a Mutius his "professed enemy. I confess, and an enemy would I have slain: as ready and willing and to de peem to king "professed enemy. "This kind of war do we youths of Rome denounce openly unto thee: no battel, no fight elfe "Inalt thou need to fear. enlous fight. Hart up and leapt from his royal leat and chair of effate, commanding the young than to be had from the altar. "Go thy waies (quoth he) in peace, thou that halt done thy own lelf Porfenahis o more michief than thou haft attempted against my person. My lot it was o to be the fielt the relt as it (hall fall out, will be here shortly, and wait every man his turn and "time, untill they hit right upon thee. Mutins, fornamed alterwards Scavola, by reason of the atmins fornamaim of his right hand, was no fooner dimitted and gone, but there followed threight after him to med Seawold. Rome, Emballadors from Porfena; and fo much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger past of the first assault, from which not hing preserved him but a small errour and oversight of the assault and also for the hazard to come, for look how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempt, lo often frood he in jeopardy of his life) that of his own accord he offered the Romans conditions of peace. And among other capitulations, he flood hard upon this article (but Fallin vain) of refloring the Tarquini into their Kingdom, This point the King urged instantly, rather because he could not well himself deny the Tarquins so much, than for that he was ignorant; that the Romans would never yield thereto. But another article he got granted, namely, the relief thion of the Veientians lands again : and the Romans were driven of necessity to give him the-Hages; in case they would have the Kines garrison to quit the Janiculum. Upon these conditions Peace between peace was concluded, and Porfena withdrew his forces from the Janiculum, diflodged and departed out of the territory of Rome: The Senators bestowed frankly upon Mutius, as a tellimonial of his valianticista piece of ground tying beyond Tyber, which was afterwards called, Mutia prata, 7. 8 Murius his meadows.

Upon this honourable regard andreward of verture, women were likewise provoked and en-G couraged to enterprize worthy acts in the fervice of the Common-weal. For a young damofel and Virgio, named Classia, one of shole hostages a forestate, whiles the Tuicans were encamped and the commensated one far from the banks of Tyber, decetting her keepers and leading a company of oclassia. The commensated of the manufacture of the commensated of th nor with them, brought them all to Rome fale, and delivered them to their parents, kinsfolk and friends. Which being reported to the King, he are the first formed at ir, and was all in a rage, and sent unto Rome certain Orators to demand again his holtage Clacka by name: as for all the reft, he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further confideration he admired H the enterprise, and plainly said, it surpassed far all the adventures of the Coclines and the Muii: so as he pretended that if the maid were not rendred again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would fend her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promile faithfully kept: For both the Romans restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and seen also it was, that vertue was not only secured saie, but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tuscan King, For after he had commended and praised the damosel, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chuse whom she would. And when they were all brought forth before her, the made choise (they say) of those young boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not only most befitting her virginity, but also by the accord of I the holtages themselves best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that fex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via facra, there was erected her statue, A maiden

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemn ceremonies, this one custome received from our anceftors are differing and diagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the TuGan King from before the City of Remes, and this it is: In the portiale of goods they use to proclaime first aloud, The fale of King Porfena his goods. This ceremonial custome must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some K more gratious and gentle occasion at the first, then this title or outward form pretendeth, of selling goods by way of hostility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Porfer a dislodging from the Janicle, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long fiege diffressed and in great freights, his rich Camp furnished with victual and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentifull countries of Heiruria near adjoyning: which goods, for fear there should have been some havock and spoil made thereof in warlike wife, in case the people had been let loose to the rifling of the tents, were after fold, and called Porfena his goods: which title fignified rather their thankfull acceptation of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romans power, nor at their disposition.

Thus Porsena having given over the Roman war, because he would not seem to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his son Arms with part of his sor-ces to surprize and assault Aricia. At the first this sudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins, but afterward when the had gotten aid both from the Latine nations & also from Cumes, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the enemy battel. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuscans charged them so hotly that at the very first encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricins, But the troups of the Cumans fetting policy against force, went a little aside,made way and gave some ground, and when the enemies had outstripped them & were rashly and disorderly passed beyond them, they turned their ensigns, and set upon their backs : so were the Tulcans, being in the very train of their victory, befer round about and flain in the midft M between. Only a small remnant of them after the loss of their Captain, because they had no other place of refuge nearer were fain to trudg to Rome without weapons and difarmed, like suppliants both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained and bestowed in severall lodgings. Some of them when they were cured of their wounds repaired home, reporting the hospitality & courteous usage they have found Many remained fill at Rome for love of their hofts and the City: who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thuscus vicus, the Tulcan

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coff. In that year, for a fmall end, there came Embaffadours from Porfena, to treat about the restoring of the Targuins into their Realm: to whom this answer was returned : that the Senate would send Embassadors N to the King himself: whereupon there were immediatly addressed unto him in Embassie the most honourable personages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch givenby word of mouth unto his Embassadours at Rome; not for that they could not have shapen them this short answer, "They would no Kings have: But to this end that for ever after there should "be no fuit renewed of that matter, nor in fo great mutuall benefits, and favours passed between "them, some discontent arise on either side, whiles he might be thought to request that "which was repugnant and prejudiciall to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, unless "they would be executors of their own wrongs, and feek their own milithievance, to make their denial unto him, whom by their good wils they would not feem to deny ought for any thing in O "the world. But as to the substance in the matter, this was the point : namely, that the people of "Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free state: and fully setled in this pur-" pose. To set open their gates to the enemies sooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this " mind and resolution, That look when the freedom of that City had an end, then should the "City come to an end also. To conclude therefore they were to entreat him, that if he tendered "the weal and safety of Rome, he would permit them to be free still and at their own liberty.

The Second Book of T. Livius.

A The King overcome with very modefly, and much abashed inhimself, answered thus again: "Since you are fo fully minded and stiffy bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor dull "your ears with harping ftill upon this unpleasant string, and do no good : nor bear the Tarquins "any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, which nothing at all is in my power to speriorm. Let them from henceforth feek some other place of exile, either for peace or war, as "they shall think more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free cour e of "amity, and alliance between me and you. To these good and kind words he joyned better and more friendly deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand he sent home: and the Veientians lands which by the covenants indented at Janiculum, were taken away, he restored to the B Romans again. Thus Tarquin feeing all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tusculum to his fon in law Mamilius Octavius, there to live and ipend the rest of his daies in banishment, So there continued faithfull peace between the Romans and King Porfess.

Then were Cost, M. Valerius and P. Post humius. In that year the Romans sought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Confuls triumphed. But afterwards the Sabins made greater preparation of war: to withstand whom, as also for fear of some sudden danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected war, although none was openly icen, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the second time created Coss. But among the Sabins there grew fomecivill discord between that part that would have war, and the contrary that fought peace: which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. For Appius Clausus (who after-C wards at Rome was furnamed Appius Claudius) a perswader himself of quietness and repose, being Appius Claudius overmatched and not able to make his part good with the adverief action that minded and stirred us troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Regillum fled to Rome, who were enfranchifed Civizens, and possessed of those lands that lye beyond the river * Anio. * At this day And from thence came the name of the old trade Appia: after that other new Citizens were put Teveron unto them, those I mean, that descended of that race, and out of the same territory. This Appins. Tribe Appia. was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coff went with a strong power into the Sabins land, where after they had first wasted the Country, and after in battell abated the strength and puissance of the enemy; fo, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned D to Rome in triumph.

The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumius were Coss. P. Valerius ended hisdaies in great glory, reputed the only fingular man in those times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civill affairs: but so poor was his estate, that he skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civil attains: out to poor was the Cities charge right of P. Fatrias, fine and not wherewith to defray his funerall expences, and was therefore at the Cities charge right of P. Fatrias, fine Conference of Power mourted for him as they did for Britas. honourably enterred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brutus,

The same year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Cora, revolted to the Auruncans. The Romans first began to war upon the Auruncans. And after they had discomfitted a great host of them, who met with the Confuls as they entred the borders, and fiercely made head again it them, then all the Auruncan war was driven and translated wholly to Pomeria. The slaughter and execution E was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them flain outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners, they spared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither staid the surious race of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword. In this year also was a triumph at Rome.

The Confuls Opiter Virginius, and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next year, assailed Pometia, first by meer force to scale the wals, after with pavoises, mantelets, platforms, and other fabricks, raised against it. Upon whom the Auruncans sallied forth, rather of a cankred and malicious harred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all afore them: and having F thus fired their fabricks aforefaid, hurt and flain a great number of their enemies, one of the Confuls also (but his name precisely is not by any author set down) was sore wounded, strucken down from his horse and well-near stain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Conful behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whilest their wounds might be healed, and a new supply of souldiers made, they came against Pomerra, in more furious manner than before, and also with a stronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike inflraments of affault, they were proceeded thus forward that the fouldiers were ready to scale and get up the wall, then they within yielded: and notwithstanding the Town was thus surrendred up, yet there was no more mercy shewed unto it, than if it had been forced by affault. The chief and principal Citizens shamefully G lost their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were fold at the spear in open market like slaves. the Town fackt and razed to the ground yea, and money made of the lands belonging to it. The Confuls for that they had so wreaked their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great war they had finished, obtained triumph. The year following, were Posthumius Caninius and T. Largins Consuls. In this year, during the games and plaies at Rome, certain yonkers of the Sabins, went about in a wanton jollity to carry away and ravish the Curtezans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people ran together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, infomuch, as they went to- H gether by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which imall occasion there was a rebellion like to enfue, Over and befides the fear of the Latines war, (for to encrease their troubles the more) news came, and it was certainly known, that by the folliciting and practife of Oftavius Mamilius, there were already thirty nations banded together against the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of thele io great occurrents, there arole the first occation and mention made of creating a Dicator. But neither in what year, nor in what Confuls time (for that it can hardly be beleeved, that they should be of the Tarquins faction, and yet that allo is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly known: Howbeit, in the most ancient writers I find that T. Largins was created the first Dictator, and Cneus Cassins Gene- I rall of the horsemen: and Consular men(i, e, such as had been Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for fo the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this inducethme the rather to beleeve, that Largius an ancient man, and one who had been Confulbefore, was appointed as a Controller and Matter over the Confuls, and not M. Valerius the fon of Marcus, and grandion of Volesus, who as yet had not attained to the Consuls dignity. For if these Consular men asoresaid had been minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all other furely they would have made choice rather of his father M.Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowels and valour, and one befides that had been Conful. When the Dictator was once cholen at Rome, and the axes were feen born before him, the Commoners flood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make ac- K count of any help (as they might under the Confuls, who were both in commission alike, and of equall authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for fuccour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabins likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily perswaded he was made of purpose for them : and thereupon, they sent Embassadors to treatfor peace, who befeeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon fo small a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this aniwer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but fuch old babes as they might not, who never refled to fow debate, and minister occasion of one war after another. Howbeit, they fate in confultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabins could have found in their hearts and condescended to make good and repay the expences L that the Romans had disburfed about the war: for that was the thing demanded at their hands, So, defiance was fent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce. during the Consulfhip of Servius Sulpitius, and M. Manlius Tullus, in whose year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

After them were T. Ebmins, and C. Vetufius. In their time * Fidene was befieged, * Cruftumeria won, and Presefte revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delaid, but brake forth. A. Posthumiss the Dictator and T. Ebusins Generall of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horie, fet forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus, in the Territory of Tusculum and there encountred the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquin were M in the hoft of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and cost more bloudshed a good deal, than others usually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only togive direction by their counsel and advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley, And not one almost of the principall leaders escaped out of the skirmish, either of one side or of the other, safe and found, save only the Roman Dictator, For as Posthumius was encouraging his men, and setting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Superbus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and not able to bestir himself) fet spurs to his horse, and ran full butt against him. But having caught a thrust from aside, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of fafety. And in the other wing, Ebutius Generall of N the horsemen, set upon Oct. Mamilius: but he, the Captain I mean of the Tusculans, was well ware of him, and espied him coming, and ranhis horse with full carreer likewise upon him, and so desperately they bear their Lances one against the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arm, and Mamilius wounded in the breaft, whom the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. Asfor Ebuius not able any longer to bear his staff, with his arm fore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battel. The Leader of the Latines, nothing dismaied for all his hurt, mainrained fight ftill: and seeing his souldiers somewhat distressed, he sendeth for the Regiment of the Roman exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his son: who sticking more couragiously unto it, for anger that their goods were spoiled, and they driven out of their own countrey, renewed the combate afresh for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to O recule and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicula, espying young Tarquin vaunting himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exuls, inflamed also with a defire of domestical glory of his house: that the same family which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewile winthe honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly spear ran against T arguinins, who giving way to his mortall enemy, retired back to his own Regiment, But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the exiles,

A and there a common fouldier hapned to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horse staid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Roman Knight ready to die, feil to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt. Post humins the Dictator, after he perceived to valiant a man faln, and the banished man advancing luttily forward with full trot, and his own fouldiers diffressed, and at point to turn their backs gave express commandement unto his own band, which he had about him of cholen tall men for to guard his perion, that as many of their fellows as they faw flie, they should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counter-fear the Romans made head again and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and couragious stomacks, Charged upon B the wearied exiles, and killed them on every fide, Wherupon began another combate also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark, The Generall of the Latines feeing the battalion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, speedily taketh with him into the forefront of the battell certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear guard to fuccour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, espied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Mamilius by his gorgeous harnels, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the Generall of the horsemen a little before encountred the Colonell of his enemies so hotly that both he ran Mamilius through his sides, and slue him outright, and also whilest he was disarming and risling his body, he was wounded himself with a short jave in, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first dreffing yeelded to nature and died. Then C rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their hories, and take the matter into their hands. The horsemen soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward, as if they had flown, to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the enligns. Whereat presently the Infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principal men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battel began to shrink. The Gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to purfue their enemies. The footmen likewite followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed, as men fay, a Temple to Castor, and openly promised and proposed rewards D to that fouldier that made either first or second entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so couragiously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus. The Dictator and the Generall of horiemen returned into the City with triumph, For three years after, there was neither affured peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Confuls were Q. Clalius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minutius. Whiles thele two were Confuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feaft called Saturnalia infittuted. After them succeeded A. Possburius, and T. Friginius. And in this year and not before, find Saunatia in some authors, that the faid hartell was firthen pearths I also Realities, and that I also Realities and the fire of the faid hartell was firthen pearths I also Realities, and that I also Realities and the first Realities and the fi in some authors, that the said battell was stricken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. Afterwards were Ap. Clandins, and P. Servilius created Confuls. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too exceffive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the communalty, whom untill that day they had favoured and pleatured to their full power. In the same year the Colony Signia, which King Tarquinias had erected, was now stored again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up Wards 21. 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the "Ides of May, With the Nation of the Volicians * 15 of May, in the time of the Latine war neither was there peace nor war : for both the Volicians had levied a power for aid to fend unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good speed: and alfo the Roman Dictator hastned the more for fear he should in one battell have to deal with Latines and Volscians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Confuls led forth their Legions into the Volicians Country The Volicians fearing no revenge for their defignment (that was intended only, and nevergame in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for occurrent. No sminding therefore to make refiftance, and forgetfull of warlike prowels, they delivered G 300 of their Noblemens children out of Cora and Pometia for hostages, Whereupon the Roman Legions rom thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volicians being somewhat eased and delivered of their sear, came again to their old biace & returned to their wonted nature, and feeretly under-hand made preparation anewfor war; joyning with them as confederates in this quarrel the Hernikes. They lend also their Embassadours all about to move and so-Picite Law um Bur the Latines, for their late overthrow arthe Lake Regillus, took fuch a spleen and Compagna de hatred against him wholoever, that should once put into their heads and perswade them to take Roma.

arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadours, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volicians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Confuls : where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms, ready to war upon the Romans, Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented therewith, that they fet at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and fent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good footh pleasent & glad were the Latins then, for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They fend moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitoll, for a present to Jupiter, With these Embassadours and the present those prisoners which before were I fetfree, came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miferies, and promifed therewith the like courtefie and mutuall hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publikely and privately, united more neerly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Voician war was now at hand, fo the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at theheart, and all this arole by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring wife, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours they were held prisoners and K oppressed : saying that the freedom of the Commons was more safe intime of war, than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens, This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of it ielf still kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, let on a light fire. A certain aged person chanced to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparrell was all to tattered, foule, and loathfome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his long side beard and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his vilage and countenance wild and gastly. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some said, he had done good fervice in the wars, had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the L field: and the common people, as pittying his efface, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and ingular commendation. Himself likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testifie his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common affembly to hear a solemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, fo poor, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continual forraging, and waiting of the Territory, not only loft the revenews and encrease of his lands, but also his Mannor-house was burnt, all his goods ransacked and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might, he was driven to take up money and run in debt; which growing more and more by paiment of in- M terest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had lest him, and to turnhimself out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder way in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thraldom, but also imprisoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruell and but herlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scourged, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the fight and hearing hereof, there arole a great outery of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such fort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loofe came forth from all parts into the open freets, calling the Quirites and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this leditious rout, and N every where in all the freets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Comsus
P. Servilius, and App. Claudius made the better speed, and come upon them to appeale the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose comming the multitude turned unto them, shewing their irons, and all their other shamefull misuage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threating wife, rather than by way of inpplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while flood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publike counfell. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to re-O pair to the Confols: as for the rest, they were asraid not only to come into the Councill-house, but allo to venture abroad into the market place, fo that by reason of their small affembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with delaies, furming, that the Senators which were away, absented themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Consuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question

A made but a form and game at their miteries. This broil to increased, that hardly could the reverence and Majelty of the Confuls restrain the peoples rage. But the Senators standing in doubtfull tearms, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they refolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and to fit ient house gathered, neither the Lords there affembled, no nor yet the Confuls, could well agree amongst themselves what to do in this cafe. Applies a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Divers opinion to do in the cafe. Contular authority and commandment, laying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on the nate houle. reft' would be quiet. But Servilius more inclined to mi d and gentle remedies, thought it a more lafe and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and sell stomack. But amidst B these troubles there happed a greater and more searful occurrence: For certain L sins on horse-back rode in post, and brought news in halty and tumultuous manner, that the Volicians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to affault the same. Which news being heard (lee how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles. than in the Commons. The comminate lept for joy, and faid the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take preftmony, or to enter their names in the Mutter-matters book, laying that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and none but they: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) lerve as fouldiers; & let themtake weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profits, the prizes and reward, thereof. But contrary-wife the Senate penfive and furcharged with C this twofold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, belought the Conful Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the fafety of the Common-weal, beiet as it were round with to tearful perils. Then the Conful difinified the Senate, and came forth into the assembly of the people, where he shewed what care the LL, of the Senate had for the good of the commons: "But whiles they were (quoth he) buly in confultation for the greatest part "(I coniels) of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while, that of necessity they must see to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they stand "in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not se possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any respite and leasure granted) were it either for the commonscredit and honesty, not to fight for their Country, D unies they had their pay before hand; nor well beleeming the Nobles and for their reputation, to look unto and take order haltily, to redress the mileties and calamities of their citizens of upon lear, tather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech or his he confirmed with an edict, by vertue whereof, he gave freight commandment: Imprimes, that no man should keep bound or in prison, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Confuis, Item, that no perion should hold in possession, or fell the goods of any souldier, so long as he abode in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors there prefent, were immediately by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, E and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of alleageante, to be true fouldiers and faithful to the State, A number there was of thefe a neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quit themselves or took more pains in the Volscian war. Then the Consul led forth his power against the enemies, and within a little of them incamped himself. The nightfollowing, the Volkians prefuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, assailed the tents, if haply in the night leason any of them might have been wrought, to abandon the camp, and come tothem, or to practile any treason. But the Sentinels descried them, and upon allarm given, the whole army arole, and every man made halt to his weapons. Thus came that enterprite of the Volkians to nothing. The rest of the night both parts rested, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volicians having filled up the trench, affailed the bulwarks and rampiers. F And by that time they had on every fide plucked up the fences, pallifadoes, and other fortificatiions, the Conful, who for all he was called unto instantly on every hand, but of the debtors aforefaid especially above the rest, to give the fignal, and to found the battel, made some stay on purpole to try the courage of his men: and feeing well now their forwardness and their fromacks, at length gave them a token to rush forth, and so lettern them loole, as eager to fight as might be, So at the very first onset the enemies were presently discomfired and put to flight: the sootmen followed hard upon them in chase and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavillions, who fill feared exceedingly what might become of them : and within a while their very campallo, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volicians themselves for fear, were forced

G and rifled. The next day following, the legions marched to Suessa Pometia, for thirher the enemies were fled: and within few dayes the Town was won, and put to the fack, and the spoil and pilage given away: whereby the needy fouldiers were somewhat refreshed. The Conful in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambasia-

him. To whom after confukation had with the Senate, and a decree passed, peace was granted:

but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabins also put the

Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather then a war. For word H was brought in the night leaton, that an army of the Sabins were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio robbing, spoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went, Forthwith was fent thirber the whole power of hories under the conduct of A. Posthumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator, After him followed the Conful Servilius with a cholen regiment of footmen, Most of the enemies as they ranged abroad a forraging in feattering wife were by the horsemen surprized and inclosed. And when the Infantry besides marched against the Sabins legion, they were not able to refitt: for being tired out, partly with their long journy, and partly with plundring all night long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly fireigth enough to run away. Thus the Sabin war in one night was heard of and end- I ed. The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope, that they had peace on every fide, behold the Aurunean Embassadors came into the Senate proclaming war, unless they would forgo the Volkian lands, and reftore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in fight not far from Aricia, railed up the Romans in fo great a broil and hurliburiy, that the Senators could neither be consulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battel with the Auruncans. And in one day that war

Thus when the Roman fouldiers had gotten victory within fo few days in fo many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promise of the Consuland the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appins both upon a proud stomack, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discredit and disanul the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their (reditors hands, and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a souldier, whose case it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Conful his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promife: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their scars there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the L Senate, and as a Conful, succour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his souldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Consul: but so stood the case that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: so sully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet wonfavour with the Nobles : whiles the Nobles took himfor a foft and base minded Consul, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler : insomuch as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appins. For, the Confuls hapned on a time to strive, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from M themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the peoples election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals he should erect and institute a Colledge or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn feaths or sestival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Lettorius, a principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it easily appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office beflowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling; as to digrace and deface the Confuls. Hereat one of the Confuls, yea, and the Patricii flormed and fumed exceedingly againft the Commons, But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwife, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of N the Consuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor sued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, fo that the Confuls fentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out, evilentreated, and misused of the Commons, being many together. So the whole fear and hazzard of the main chance, even of liberty it felfe, was now altogether translated from the debtors to the creditors In the very neck of these troubles, there arose a sear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined, there (hould be a muster of souldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled: All this while Appius raged and took on, " inveying bitterly against the nicety and popu-Apparents in Carriage of him elf, had betrayed the Weal-publick, and over and befides that, he had not mini-"Ared justice for the loane of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought "the matter foto pass that he could take no musters by vertue of the decree of the Senate How-"beit (faith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forfaken and forlorne, nor yet the Confular "aurhority utrerly cast down and trodden under foot for he would himself alone, if there were "no more but he defend and maintain both his own place and the Senators dignity. A multitude therefore flood thus malapertly, as their daily manner was, about the bar, he commanded one principal Captain of fedition to be attached and hadaway and as he was haled to prison by the Sergeants and Lictors he appealed. Neither would the Conful have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obfinate fiffness with much ado been overswayed more through the diffret advitese authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude: fo resolute was he, and his heart so couragious, to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the milchief more & more daily, tellified not with open mouth & broad speeches only, but allo (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles fecret meetings, and conferen-B ces, At length these Colliso odious unto the Commons, went out of their office, to wit, Appinia man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons. After whom A.Virginius, and T. Verusius entred their Consulship, But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Conjulsthey should have began to affemble together by night, some in Esquilie, others in the Avenime: to the end, they might not be unprovided and to leek upon a suddain, what to do in the common place, nor manage their business hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Confuls supposing (as it was indeed) a perilous example and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advile what was to be done : they took fo on, and kept fuch outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Conjuls should lay upon the Senate the burden and heavy C load of that, which properly they by vertue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves and surely, if there were any Magistrates in the City (saythey) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other countel but publick whereas now the State is divided into a thoufand Courts and conventicles: whiles some have their meetings and affemblies in Esquilia, others in Aventine: Affuredly, one only man indeed (for that is more than a Conful) fuch a one as Appius Claudius was, would foon dispatch, and in one minute of an hourscatter these their unlawful asfemblies. The Confuls upon this rebuke and check, replyed again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are relolved to do nothing flackly and coldly, but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster and levy souldiers with all rigour and severity adding D moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malapert and too licentious. And when the Senate was difmiffed, the Confuls went into the Tribunal & took their places, and summoned by name all the youngeriort to appear; and none making answer to his name, the * From 17 multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick Oration, said plainly, that the Com- years of age to mons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Confuls should never get 10 47. much as one fouldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickly before was made, and reftore to every man again his liberty, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Masters. The Consuls faw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Councel house walls spake so thoutly & gave out so great words, there E was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people, And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worft, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advise of the Senate, and to confer with them, But then all the younger fort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the Consuls feats, willing them to give over their Confulthip, and to refign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Confuls had fufficiently weighed and tried both wayes thus at length began they and laid. A great fedition and commotion is toward, A fedi ion bemy LL. To the end therefore that we pretend not ignorance, and tay another day ye were not fore- tween the Contold of it, there is a great sedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who suls and the find greatest fault with our remisseness and lack of courage, affist us and sit with us while we take propte. F the musters: and since you will needs have it so, we will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on Let purpole, one of them that were there in fight to be cited and called by name. But he stood still and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then lent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulsed off, then those Nobles which fate there on the beach to affift the Confuls, cried out upon the (hameful indignity, and faid it was intollerable, and so ran down in haft from the Tribunal feat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Listor alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patritians. So that the Cost, were fain to step between, and then the fray was appealed. In which, there being & no Rones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, brawling and chasing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate house called in a great hurry : and with more confulfon fat they there in Councel: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and milufed, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest Of them gave their determination as much by clamor and notic, as by fentence and opinion groundad upon region. At laft, when the tempest was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the

their Court and Councel-house, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to consult orderly H and three opinions there were amongst them, P. Virginius would not have it a common and general case (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditors) but his advise was, that they should only be considered, who relying upon P. Servilius the Conful his word and faithful promile, had lerved in the wars of the Volkians, Auruncans and Sabins. T. Largius, he supposed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good deferts, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good fervice: but for as much as the whole commonalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unleis they were all provided for, and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quietness nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which more is) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than I others, the discord would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appins Claudius a man both of natural disposition sierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outragious, netled with the Commons hatred against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and commendations of the Nobles on the other fide, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skie, spake to this effect: "There to great flirs and mutinous hurliburlies, my Masters (quothhe) is not long of the The Oration "misery and calamity, but only of too much liberty of the Commons: who rather upon fatness "are grown wanton and unruly, than for any want unpatient and discontent; and all this mischief "no doubt is sprung of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For so long as it is in their power to "flie for help unto thole that have erred as well as they, well may the Conful threaten and give "out menacing words: as for any rule else or command they shall have none among them. Come K on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then shall this furious rage, which now setteth all on a light fire, be soon husht and quite extinguished. Let " me see then, who dare beat a Lictor, when he shall well know, that he alone whose honor "and Majefly he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life, Many men thought this sentence of Appins to be very hard and cruel; yea, and dangerous withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Vetusius. That other likewise of Largius was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and actions was imposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and mean between the convenient of the convenient both. But by reason of the faction and regard of private benefit, which alwayes hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Counsel, Appins prevailed, and hemissed very little but he himself had [been made Dictator. Which if it had come to pais, it would furely have estranged and alienated quite the hearts of the Commons, in that most busy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volscians, Equians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Confuls and elder Senators, had great care and confideration to chuse such a one, as might by mildness of his own nature allay and qualify the exceeding rigour and sternness incident to Soveraign and absolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the fon of Volesus. The Commons albeit they saw well enough this Dicator created for to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictator set forth, which was welneer all one with that other of the Conful Servilius, much confirmed and setled their minds. For supposing now, they M had more hold both of the man, and also of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entred their names into the muster book: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Confuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred any longer. The Aquians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embassadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to fend fuccour, or to give them leave to put on armor themselves for the desence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the safer and surer way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Conful Verusius was sent thither, and he stayed them from fur - N ther foraging and wasting. For the Æquians were departed out of the plains, and trusting rather in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, flood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains. The other Conful who was gone against the Volscians, because he would not elso lose any time, drew the enemy forth (by walting the country especially) to encamp himself neerer, and so at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the mids between both camps : where each army flood before their rampiers, embattelled, and ranged in array, with hanners displayed ready to fight. The Volscians were somewhat more in number, whereupon they began battail disorderedly and as if they fet light by the enemy. But the Roman Conful neither advanced forward, nor fuffered his men once to shout and answer again, but charged them to stand still with their jave o lins fast in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them luftily with their fwords, all that ever they could. The Volicians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romans, who seemed for fear to stand assonied : but after they once perceived that they were horly reencountred by them again, and faw their swords gliztering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and fallen into fome trains layed for them, and so turned their backs. And by reason they came running before

A to battail , their firength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contrarywife, because against the beginning of the fight they had stood quiet, were fresh of body, and soon overtook them thus overtoiled, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chafed them into * Veitre, and entred the Town pelmell one with another in a * Bellites, medley the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More blondshed there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and (exes, as they came in their way than in the very battail, A veryfew, even fuch as without weapon yeelded themselves, were spared and pardoned Whiles these things were a doing amongst the Volscians, the Dictator discomfited and put to flight the Sabins, with whom he had much cruel war: yea, and forced them to abandon and B quit their camp. For having feat his horiemen into the main battail of the enemies, which they had but flightly (trengthened within, and beflowed the ranks there very thin, and all to firetch out the wings on both fides more at large, he brake their arraies: and when they were once difordered, the footmen came in upon them: and in the fame brunt were they Masters of their camp, and so the war ended. There was not in those dayes a braver battail fought and more renowned, ferting afide that only at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accultomed honors, both he and his posterity after him, were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus for to behold at eale the folemn games, and there was fet the Ivory chair of effate, called Sella curulis. The Volicians thus vanquished, lost the territory about Velure, and new inhabitants were sent thither from the City to people and to till the grounds, so that it became a Colony. Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Æquians, but in truth, full against the Consul his will, for that they were to climb up a fleep Hill (to their diadvantage) for to meer with the enemy. But the Souldiers blaming him for trifling out, and making delayes, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and so his word and promife, like the Confuls before him, should come to nothing; drave him perforce to lead up his army, rashly and at adventure against the Hills. This being an enterprise ill ordered, and an error elcaped, fell out norwithflanding very well through the cowardite of the enemy: who before they were come within thor and the darts cast, amazed at the venturous neis of the Romans, forfook their holds which they had in most defensible places, and leapt down D into the valleys over against them. There was bootyse pillage good enough, and a bloudlefs victory.

Having field thus fortunately abroad in three leveral wars, the Senators and Commons were not careless of home-affairs, what would be the iffue thereof. The Bankers and Ulirers, what with favor, and what with fubril and cautelous policy, had deviled aforehand and wrought fuch means, as might frustrate and disappoint not only the Commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerus, after the return of Verusius the Conful, dealt first and above all other matters and causes at the Councel table, in the behalf of the people that had archieved fuch victories, and propounded to know their minds, What should be done with those Dictatorin endebted, endangered, and imprisoned persons. "Which motion of hisbeing distinct and re- the Senate, " jected: I fee well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I perswade to concord and E unity: with ye will (trust me truly) ereit belong, that the commonalty of Rome had more "Patrons and Advocates like my self. As for me, I will neither bear my citizens any longer in "hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain, to effect nothing, Civil discord at home, and " forrain war abroad, caused the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten "without, behold it is crossed and hindered within: yethad I rather be present at the fight of a "mutiny and infurrection when I am a private person, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the Councel-house, and yeelded up his Dictatorship withal. The Commons saw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a discontentment and grief that he took in their behalf, for very pitty and compassion of them, he gave over the place: and therefore, as if he had fully dif-praising and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to fear, left if the army were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventicles, and new conspiracies contrived : therefore, albeit the musters were taken by the Distator: yet because the fouldiers had fworn alleageance to the Confuls, supposing they were still bound to warfare by vertue of that oath, and pretending a colour that the Æquians renued war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the City. This haftened the fedition the fooner and fet it forward. At first, as men faid, they complotted and laid their heads together about murdering and making away the Confuls, to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better schooled and advised, that G no mans confrience can be cleared of feruple, and discharged of an oath once taken, by committing a finful act and working milchief, they withdrew themselves out of the way by the perswasion of one Sicinius, and without conge of the Consuls, departed as far as Mount Sacer, on the farther fide of the River Ania, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and sooth valt of the more cutrant, than that whereof Pifo is the Author (namely, that the commons retired them-commons of felves to Aventine.) There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified them- Rosse into felves within a trench and rampier, and kept quiet for certain dayes, neither taking not doing mount sacre.

Agr. Menenius his Oration to harm; as having caried with them such things only as were necessary for the sustenance of their H life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to feek what to do. The Commons forlorn of their fellow Commoners doubted the violence of the Senators: the Senators again flood in fear and jealousie of the Commons that remained fill behind; and were in tuipense whether it were better they abode fill among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long trow ye, will a multitude once disbanded; rest in quiet? Again, in cale any forrain war should arise in the mean time, what might ensue thereupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreafonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy. So it was I thought good and agreed upon, that one Menenius Agrippa (a fair spoken and eloquent man, gracious withal and well-beloved among the commons, for that he was from them descended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the campaster that old and harsh kind of eloquence in those dayes, spake as men saith to this effect, and told this tale and parable : "Upon a time (quoth he) when as in mans body, all the parts thereof agreed not, as now they do in one but each member had a several intent and meaning; yea, and a speech by it self: 66 fo it befel, that all other parts befides the belly, thought much and repined that by their careful-" nels, labor, and ministery, all was gotten, and yet all little enough to serve it: and the belly it self "I lying still in the mids of them, did nothing else but enjoy the delightsome pleasures brought un-"to her. Whereupon they mutined and conspired altogether in this wise, That neither the hands K 66 should reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, nor yet the "teeth grind and thew the same. In this mood and fit, whiles they were minded to familh the " poor belly, behold the other limbs, yea, and the whole body befides, pined, wasted, & fell into an extreme confumption. Then was it well feen that even the very belly also didino small service, but Gled the other parts, as it received food it felf: feeing that by working and concocting the meat " throughly, it digesteth and distributeth by the veins into all parts, that fresh and perfect blood "whereby we live, we like, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application to wit, how like this intestine and inward redition of the body, was to the fell stomack of the commons, which they had taken and born against the enators, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began some treaty of unity and concord: and among other articles it was conditioned L and granted Ithat the Commonalty should have certain sacred and inviolable Magistrates of their own among themselves, such as might have power to assist the Commons against the Consuls: Item, that it might not be lawful for any Senator to bear that office. So there were created two Tribuns of the Tribunes of the Commons, C. Licinius and L. Albinus. And their elected three other fellow officers unto them. Of whom Sicinius, the Author of the fedition or infurrection was one, who were ple first creathe other twain is not for certain known. Some fay there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the facred law was there made concerning their immunity. During this infurrection and sevolt of the commons, Sp. Coffins and Posthumius Cominius entered their Confulfhips. In whose time a league was made with the people of Latium. For the establishing whereof, one of the Consuls stayed behind at Rome: the other was sent unto the Vol-M scian war, who discomfited and put to flight the Volscians of Amium, chasing and driving them into the Town Longula, which he won, And immediatly he took Mucamites a Town of the Vol-scians, and after that with great force affaulted Corioli.

There was in camp then among the flowre of gallant youths, one Caius Martius, a Noble yong Gentleman, right politick of advife, active befides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was jurnamed Coriolanus. Whiles the Romanarmy lay at fiege before Corioli, and were amuzed wholly upon the Towns-men within, whom they kept fast shut up, and feared no present danger at all from any forrain war without: behold, all on a fuddain, the Volscian legions that came from Ansium, affailed them: at which very instant the enemy also sallied out of the Town. Which Martins feeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a lufty band of elect men, not N only repressed and stopped the violence of those that issued and brake upon him, but also whiles the gate stood open, fiercely rushed in himself: and having made a foul flaughter of people thereby, at his first entrance into the City, and caught up fire at a venture, flung it upon the houses that food upon and about the walls. Whereupon arose a great outcry of the folk within the Town, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is feen in such a fright. Which at the very first, both hardened the Romans, and also troubled the Volscians : and no marvel, seeing the City taken before their sace, for which they were come to rescue. Carioli forced. Thus were the Volicians of Antium defeated, and the Town Corioli won. And Martins through his praise, so much obscured and stopped the light of the Consul his same, that had it not been ingraven in braffe for a remembrance and monument, That there was a league with the Latines, and O the same made by Sp. Cassius alone (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cominius warred with the Volicians.

The same year died Menenius Agrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of grapa, and his mons than before. This truce-maker, this mediator for civil attonement, this Embaffador and poverty.

Messenger from the Senators to the Commons this reconstitution of the commons this reconstitution. In which year when all was quiet with us. abroad for any war, and the diffention at home healed up clean, and kinned: another calamity far more grievous entred the City. First, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by reason that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untilled, Hereupon insued tamine, even such as usually is incident to men besieged. And verily the houshold of bondiervants, yea, and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger if the Confuls had not B in time made the better provision: by tending purveiours all abroad to buy up corn, not only into Herraria, by coasting along the river on the right hand from Hostia, and on the left hand by Sea, (passing through the Volicians Country) even as far as Cumes: but also into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the hatred of the borderers, that Rome was enforced to have need of fuccor and relieffrom afar. Now when they had bought certain corn at Cumes, it was no fooner embarked, but the ships were stayed and arrested there, by Aristodemus the tyrant for the goods of the Tarquint , whole heir in remainder he was. In the Volician Country and Pomptinum, they could buy none for mony. There, the very Purveiors themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of Tufcame there came corn up the Tyber, wherewith the Commons were fulfained and refreshed. And confidering the streights they were in for want of his Quals, they had been fore diffressed and vexed with wars besides, and that in a very ill time, and unseasonable for them: but that the Volicians, who now were in readinels, and upon the point to make war, had a pellilence that raigned hot among them. Which heavy cross and affliction, the enemies were fo discouraged with, that when the plague began to stay, even then they conti-

The Romans both at Velitre augmented the number of the inhabitants and also at Norba, sending a new Colony into the Mountains, to be a Fortress and strength for all the territory of Pampeinum, Moreover, when M. Minutius, & A. Sempronius were Confuls great flore of corn was brought out of Sicily: and it was debated in the Senat-house, at what price the Commons should be served therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wring the Commons, and keep D them under, and to recover again those royalties, which by their departure were forcibly wrested and dimembred from the nobility. But above all others Martins Coriolanus, an utter and ca- coriolanus en pital enemy to the Tribuns power and authority, "If they will (quoth he) have their corn and veyen against victuals at the old price, let them restore unto the Senators their ancient right and prehemite the Tribuns. "nence. Why fee I (as one brought under the yoke of fervitude, and put as it were unto my " ransome, by Robbers and Theeves) these Magistrates of the Commons? why see I Siemius so "mighty? Shall I endure these indignities longer than I needs must (I that could not bear Tar-

"quinius to be King, shall Ibrook and suffer Sicinius? Let him depart aside now, and take his "Commons with him: the way is open to Mount Sacer and other Hills: Let them carry away "with them the corn out of our possessions and Lordships, as they did three years ago: ket "themen joy, take for their use, and spend the store, which they in their foolery and fury have "provided. I dare be bold to fay, that when they are by this calamity once tamed, they will "rather till and husband the ground themselves, than with weapon in hand, and by way of in-" furrection, forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot fo foon fay, whether it had been as meet, as I suppose it was possible and easy to effect, that the Senators by offering more gentle conditions in the prices of corn and victuals, might have eased themselves of the Tribuns authority over them, and also have been disburdened of those impositions which will they, nill they, were laid upon them. Well, this feemed to the Senate a sharp censure and severe sentence of Coriolanus, and for very anger also it had like to have caused the Commons to rise up in arms. For they muttered and gave it out in these tearms, "That now they were laid at and Themurmurp " affailed with famine like enemies, defrauded and bereft of their meat and pitten e: that the ing of the " outlandish corn, the only suffenance and food which fortune had ministred unto them beyond commons a

"all hope, was inatched and plucked from their mouths, unleis the Tribuns be delivered and gainst conida-"yeelded Prisoners hand and soot bound to C. Martius, unless he might have his penny worths "of the back and shoulders of the Commons of Rome. For he was now start up and become their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to servitude. As he went out of the Councel house, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribuns, as good luck was, served him with process in time, to appear at a day, and come to his answer. Herewith, their furious anger was suppressed. For now every man faw, that he was him ef to be the judge and Lord of his enemies life and death. Martius at the first scorned the Tribuns thundering

G threats, and gave the hearing, as though he made small reckoning thereof, saying; That their authority had power granted by limitation, only to aid, and not to punish: that the Tri unswere Tribuns to the Commons, and not to the Senators. But so spightfully were the Commons bent, and all so set upon mischief, that there was no other remedy, but one man mult payfor it to save & excuse the rest of the Nobles. Howbeit the Senators did what they could to withstand them; by oppoling hatred and displeasure again and making all means, what either privately they were able of themselves, or jointly by their whole Order and degree to procure. And first, this courie they affayed to ftop and overthrow the fuit commenced; namely, by fetting their followers and re-H tainers in fundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one & what they could to affright them from meetings and affemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forthat once into the Forum or common place. A man that had seen them would have said they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a befeeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their fakes, as innocent and unguilty, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they fill in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his abience, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volcians, i menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him therevenging Homack

The Volfcians at his coming received him courteoufly, and friendly intreated him every day more than other, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his country-men, by many complaints he made of them, and threats withal that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and 10 journed in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that time was a mighty great man among the Volicians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And whilesthe one of them was provoked with an old cankred grudge, and the other fet on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads to-gether and complotted to make war upon the Romans. This only thing stood in their way to K cross their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly or scarcely at all be brought, to rife and take arms again, which they had so often unhappily attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and their flomacks abated by the lois of their youth in many and fundry wars often times afore, and now at lati, by the late peftilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work; that for almuch as the od hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon tome new anger might be challed and galled again. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Playes in hand, to be fet out anew the fecond time, the occasion whereof was this. A certain housholder one morning betimes before the shews and games began had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which he carried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Thea- L tre: and with that began the playes, as if there had been no matter therein of scruple or Relig on. But not long after, one T. Latinius a mean Commoner had a dream or vision: In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the Dan et before the playes pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again and that very stately and sumptuously, fome great danger should befall the City: willing him withal, to make relation hereof unto the Conjuls, The man albeit in truth he was not without some sense and feeling of Religion and the fear of God: yet made he no such great scrupie at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majefty and countenance of the Magustrares immounted and dashed it clean: for fear lest haply he should become a talking stock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labour. But this delay and seeing of the matter, he bought tall dear. For within few dayes his son hapned to dye, M And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and suddain misfortune, whiles he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his fleep, and feemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatning moreover, that in case he made no greater hast to certify the Contuls thereof, there was a greater judgment and plague toward, and that very neer. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected and drave it off still, until he was himself overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weaknels in all his joints. Then verily the wrath of the Gods raught him to be wifer. And being overwearied with harms past and in sear of more presently to ensue, he conferred with his kinsfolk and friends to be advited by them. When he had declared unto them N what he had feen and heard; namely, how Jurner had to often appeared unto him in his fleep, and that the fearful displeasure and threatnings of the heavenly Gods were shewed plainly by fundry mischances fillen upon him: by the subconsent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Confuls, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Confuls commandment he was carried into the Councel house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the self-same things, to the ex eeding wonder and admiration of them all, fee another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Sente house a lame creeple of all his lims, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) sound upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, That the Cames should be set out as magnificently as could be devised.

To these so empiries resorted. by the motion and perswasion of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volicians. But before they were begun, Tull us according to the complot between him and Martius at home, made a fiep or errand unto the Confuls at Rome, faving that he would Actiss Tullius Willingly commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State, When to the Roman the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wife: Loth I am (quoth he) if other-"wife I could chuse, to speak ought but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I A " not to complain of any action of theirs already passed, but to give a caveat, and provide that "nothing be practifed hereafter. The nature and diposition (I may tell you) of our people, is "too too unconflant and unftayed, morel know than I would they were, a great deal: that have we tound and sele to our great colt and manifold damage, we I say, who verify at this day by your "long inflerance, and not by good defert of ours, do thand in good terms and peace of fatery, There is now here a great multitude of Volicians, the Playes and Games ready to be reprefented "and celebrate. Your City will be wholly amufed in the beholding thereof: I remember upon and teneprate. The like occasion, what was iomtimes enterprised and wrought in this City by the youth of the "Sabins; and my heart dorb tremble and quake for fear, left formeinconfiderate, rash and foolish B " part be played by ours: thus much, O ye Confuls, I thought good in our behalf and yours both, "to give you notice of beforehand. As for me, I am minded preiently to go from hence home, e lett I being here feen, might be thought in some word or deed accessary unto them, and so cul-« pable, Having made this speech he departed. When the Confuls had declared in the Senate this thing to doubtul, and yet proceeding from the mouth of to fure and certain an Author: behold, the tredit of the man (as commonly it is feen) rather than the likelihood of the matter, canfed them to be wery and circumspect, yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an A.S. that the Volicians should be jogging our of the City. And divers cryers or Bedles were tent out fundry wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the fifth, the Volicians were only much affrighted, and ran every manto and tro into C his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow meiantholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and profaned persons, they should be driven from the Games, on sestival holydayes, discarded (as a man would fay) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joynt train, Tullus (who was gone alore as far as the Ferentine head) received the formost and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words fo fitly framed and tending to thir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude into a plain field lying hard under the high way side. Unto whom, assembled together as it were to hear a fermon, he thus began to speak: "Admit (quoth he) you could fortogether as it were to hear a termon, he thus began to ipeak: "Admit (quoth he) you could for dains Tuiling D" get the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrows of to his Counthe Volician Nation; yea, and all the other quarrels whatloever; how can ye put up this dayes try-men, " spightfulreproach and dishonor received at their hands? who to our great digrace and shame, "have begun their folemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day?

"how as ye departed, ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so "many neighbour nations adjoyning?how your wives and children were brought as it were in a "Thew to make them sport and to laugh at what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard "the voyce of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you diffodged? what imagined they that happened to meet this ignominious troup as they marched Eventhis & no other, than there was fome wicked fin among us, not to be named, whereby we should as maleiactors, have Stayned and polluted their games if we had been present at the fight of them, & have committed " fome haynous act that would require by fome fatisfaction of factifice to be purged? and for that " cause were driven from having any conversation, sellowship, and society of good and godly men? "Over and besides, how can you chose but think of this, That we enjoy our lives still, only be-"caule we hastned our remove, it this may be called a remove, and not rather a plain taking of a st flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy City, where, if ye had flayed but "one day longer, you had dyed for it every one, Defiance is given already, and war denounced a-"gainft you; but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great coft and milchief that have de-Spounced it, Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and fer on fire, they went every man his way from thence home; and so effectually sollicited Feach one the people where he dwelt that in fine the whole nation of the Volicians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the Cities, Accing Tulius, and Co., Martin the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So as it foon appeared that the pullfance of the flate of Rome, confilled more in the dexterity of good Captains, than instrong armies of fouldiers. For first he went to * Circuis, from whence he expelled the Roman Coloners, and delivered the City * Monte Circ that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never so jealons, suspected, H and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Confuls, reposed hope in nothing eliesave only in war: the Commons on the other side were defirous of any thing whatloever, but war.

Now were S. Namins, and Sex. Furim Confuls: who as they were furveying and mustering the legions, and dipoling of a good Corpus de guard upon the walls, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cryed hard for peace, and with their feditious clamors, put them in exceeding fear: yea, and afterwards for ed them to affemble the Senate-house together, and to propose concerning the sending of certain Embassadors to Cn. Martius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidentlyithe commons I hearts to fail them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratours fent unto Martius to treat for peace. At whose hands they received this heavy and from aniwers if fo be the Volscians had their Lands reflored to them again, then there might be some parle "and treaty of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure Hill enjoy that booty which by war "they have gotten, then would he in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his " country-men, as also of the friendship and courtely shewed him by strangers that had given him " entertainment, do his best to make it known unto the World, that his courage and stomack is "incenfed, and not abated and quailed by his banishment, Then were the same Embassadors sent again the second time, but they might not be admitted once to set soot within the camp, It is reornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came flocking all about Veturia the Mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Counsel and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records. But howfoever it came about, this one thing is certain, they perswaded so effectually with them, ported moreover that the very Priests in their Pontificalibus, in their rich vestiments and goodly K that both Veturia an aged woman, and also Polumnia with her two little sons that she had by Martins, went toward the enemies camp, to see if women by their prayers and tears, might save the City, which men with spear and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriolanus, that there was an exceeding great train of women thither arrived: at the first, he, as one that had relented, neither for that publick Majesty in the Embassa- L dors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, and saw with his eyes The speech of in the clergy, Rood much more stilly bent against the tears of sifty women, But afterwards one of his familiar friends, who had feen and known Veturia there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the rest, as she stood betwist her daughter in law and her little Nephews: "If mine eyes "be mat hes (quoth he) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children, Where "at, Coridans, tuming like a man well near befide himfelf, arofe from his feat. and ran to meet his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in flead of prayers into a fit of choler: "Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy " or to a fon, whether I be in thy camp as a captive priloner, or as a natural mother. And have "lived indeed so long, and rubbed on still in this miserable old age of mine for this, to see thee first M "a banished man, and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou find in thine heart to waste " and spoil that countrey which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be "it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and "fell wrath flake, when thou didit fet foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being " come within the fight of Rome, arose not this in thy mind and thought, Within those walls " yonder is my house, there are my house-gods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, " belike it had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been affaulted. And if I had " no fon at all, I might have died well enough in my native countrey, whiles it remained free. But "as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonesty and shame; nor more to mine " own calamity and milery than this: and most wretched caitife though I be, yet long time so I N cannot continue, But for these here, look thou well to it, I advise thee, and have pitty of them, " who if thou go on as thou beginnest, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity. Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereat the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their own case and the state of their countrey. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his arms likewise, he let them go: and himfelf dislodged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territory of Rome, he gat himself, men said, such hatred and displeasure for this action, that it cost him his life: and murdered he was, some report one way, some another. But I find in Fabius a most ancient writer, that he lived until he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he used to utter this speech, A heavy case and miss of wrete ed for an aged man to live banilht, The men of Rome envied not those women their due deferved praifes. So free was the world in those dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all posterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Muliebris, i. Womens fortune. After all this, the Volicians joyned the Acquians unto them, and returned into the territory of But the Equians would no longer abide Accins to be their Commander. And upon

A this strike between the Volkians and Æquians, whether of them should appoint a General over the army raifed joyntly of them both, fiftr they grew to a mutiny and afterwards to a cruel battel, Such was the goodtortune of the people of Romes, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil discord and contention, no leis moreal than obtlinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Consuls then, were i , Sieinius and C. Aquilius, To Sieinius were allotted the Volkians, and to Aquilus the Herniks (who allo were out and up in arms) for their feveral Province. That year were the Herniks vanquished, but with the Volstians they fought so, as they departed on even hand, giving and taking the like.

After them were Sp. Caffins, and Proculus Virginius made Confuls. Then was there a league B concluded with the Herniks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moity, C fins the Conful was minded to diffribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation he laid too also a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much tault, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made diverse of the Senators, namely, such as were great landed men and intereffed therein, to startle for fear of hazarding their estate. Over and besides, the Senators all ingeneral were in great perplexity, left that the Conful by this largets, should rise by popular favour to such greatness, as might prejudice their free hold, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick liberty. And this was the first time that the law Agraria was published: and The law Agrato forward unto this prefent hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great filtrs and an first publito forward unto this pretent hour, it was never departed or, but with exceeding great nors and fleed concern-city of the State. The other Conful withitood this largets, with the general confent of the ing the dividi-Senators, and without contradiction of fome Commoners: who at the very first began to millike, on of wast and utterly abhor, that the donation was so common, and from the natural citizens, extended to lands among their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oftentimes hear even the Conful himlelf the Commons, Virginius, openly in his folemn Orations before the people, to deliver by way of prophelie, and as it were to prognottiate; "The this was a politient largeft of his brother Conful, and that those want the "grounds would in the end enthral the tukerthereof, and that it was the very high way to fet up a grain.

"Kingdom again, For to woat other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the La. "tins affociate in she fame? To what purpofe either, was a third part of the Lands won by conquest, ce given again to the Hernik, profess denemies but a while before, but that these nations might have D "Cassus to be such another C prain of theirs, as Coriolanus was. And thus by distingting and croffing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Confuls firived much, who might pleafe and gratify the Commons most. Virginia, by giving out that he would maintain and futier the Lands to be divided, so they were affigned to none but to the civizens of Rome: Caffin: again, who in the large's of the Lands, feemed to Court and infinuate himself with the allies and thereby was of the citizens lesse regarded and reputed to the end, that by some other benefit he might regain the hearts of his countrymen, was of opinion, and made a motive, that the mony which was received for the Sicilian corn, should be repayed unto the people. But the Commons refused and abhorred that, as a very bribe and ready bair for a Scepter and Crown. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted inspition and jealousy of his afpiring to a Kingdom, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that fo foon as he left his Office, he was condemned and purto death. Some report, that his own father did the execution: and that upon to death for examination privately had at home within his houle, he finding him faulty, whipped him first, and fo killed him, and confectated the goods and chattels of his fon, as a Deodard to Ceres, whereof a King. Statue or Image was made, with this Inscription or Title; Given out of the hors: of Cassiun. I find in some records (which sounded nearer to the truth) that he was by the "Questors of Cassiun." Treasurers bius, and L. Valerius, endited of treason, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people con-of the City. demned, and his house by order from the whole City, rased and pulled down. And at this day, it is the voyd yard that lieth before the Temple of Tellus. But how foever he had his tryal and F. judgement, privately or openly condemned he was when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Confuls. Long continued not the peoples anger and fpight against Cassius. So weet was the law Agraria in it felf, that when the Author and Upholder thereof was out of the World, they longed to have it on foot again. Which dente of theirs was the rather fet on fires through the pinching niggardife of the Senators, who having that year subdued the Voiscians and Acquians, kept the fouldiers fasting, and defrauded them of the spoil. For what prizes soever were gotten from the enemies, the Conful Fabius fold and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City. Now was the name of Fahins already odious to the Commonalty, for the last Confols fake: yet obtained the Senators to much, and held their own fo, as Cefo Fabius was created Conful with L. Amilius. This made the Common more milicious and bent to mikhief. And lecution at G home caused war abroad. Fortain war restrain'd civil discord for a while. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Amilius fought ortunately with the rebelliots Volcians and Aquians, and difeated them. Howbeit more enemies perifhed in the chife, Temple of Cathan were flain in the battel: fo horly the horfemen purioed them when they were once difform to dedicate a flain in the battel: fited and gave not over The same year was the Temple of Castor conse rated in the *Ides of Quin Dunavirs for tilis. It had been vowed afo etime in the Latins war by Posthumins the Dictator. His fon was dedication of created Dunmvir, for that purpose, and dedicated it.

This year also the Commons hearts were fet upon the law Agraria, and longed afresh after the H sweetness thereof. The Tribuns of the Commonalty graced and credited their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senators supposing verily that the multitude was furious and outragious enough, and too much of themselves, without any hire and reward, flood in great dread and horror of these largesses, as the very allurements and provocations, of rath and heady attempts: & the floutest champions of their fide to withstand the law, were the Coniuls. That part therefore and State of the City had the better hand, not only this present year, but for the next entuing. For they choic M. Fabius Cafe his brother, for the one Conini, and L. V lerins for the other, a man of the twain more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late acculation of Sp. Cassius. In which year also there was strife and I much adoc with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabij, who after three Consulfs is together one after another, by them born continually without intermission, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of Tribuns, was in great request and reputation: and in their house and family remained still for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily beltowed upon them. Then began the Veientian war, and the Volkians likewife rebelled. But for any wars abroad what foever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jars at home among their own selves they had not

I be second Book of T. Livius,

Besides this disquietness and affliction of all mens minds, occasioned by these dissentions, there K hapned (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and flrange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatning both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the foothfayers and wizards were sent out unto, to lear h forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in publick and private, as well by inspection of the inwards of sacrificed beatts, as by aspect of birds and fouls, they could affign it to nothing elie but this, that there was some errour committed in their factifices and divine liturgie. Those featul and prodigious figns proceeded fill to far, that one Oppia a veltal Nun. Convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Tullius Confuls, In which year the discord at home was nothing leis and the war abroad far greater. For the Equians role up in arms: the Veientians also entred the confines, and made much spoil, And whiles they were more and more careful L about these wars what order to take, Casa Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made Consuls, By this time the Equians affaulted Artona a City in Latium. And the Veientians having feed themselves with prizes and booties, made great crack; the they would give an affault upon the very City of Rome. These fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the stomacks of the Commons, made them much more fier e and tell, and they returned of themselves unto their old bias of refusing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senators the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extream point of necessity, had taken upon him to stop the levying and setting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and displeature of the Tribuns themselves and their authority, For the Consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whose M affittance the Confuls went through with the Muster. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabrus, against the Æquians, the other, against the Veientians commanded by Furius. Against whom there was nothing done worthy of temembrance. As for Fabins, he had somewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himself alone was he, that being Consul upheid the Common-weal, which his army for hatred of their Conful, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthy General, whereof he shewed singular proof, dien to their both in preparation, and also in man ging of the war) had so marshalled and ranged his battail, that with lending out the horiemen only, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies hor: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that difaray: neither, when the exhortation of N their leader whom they hated, prevailed net, could their own shame at least-wife, and the publick dishonor for the present; no, nor yet the imminent danger like to ensue (in case the enemy had taken heart again and made head) torce them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could he possibly make them (if to do nothing ele) so much as to march still in battail aray: but full against his commandment they retire with their ensigns: and as men sory in their hearts and ill apaid, (he that had feen them would have faid they had loft the field) curfing their General one while, and the valiant fervice of the horsemen another while, they return to their Tents, Neither wist the General what way to remedy this so pestilent an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may fee, that brave men, of fingular and excellent wits, have been more to feek and fail in their skill, how to govern a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The O Conful returneth to Rome, having purchased more hatred of his froward and stubborn fouldiers, than won honor by his martial prowess. Nevertheless, the Senators prevailed so much that the Consulhip kept refidence still in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Consul, and joyn with him Cn. Manlius for his collegue.

This year likewife, had one patrone and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the same course, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hundared A the musters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith disquieted again, then Ap. The politike Claudius arose up and said, "That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the practice of Ap Claudine arole up and faid, "That the year before, the I from the year before, the I food to share the Pine Claudine arole up and faid, "That the year before, but in example for ever hereafter: for almuch to abate the "as it was well feen then by experience, that of it felf even among their own felves it fell apieces: Tribunes su-"and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get thoray, "the feart and victory of his fellow, yea; and the favour also of the better part for to purchase the good of the weal-publike. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull, "ready to affir the Confuls: and if there were but one, even that, one were fufficient to stand "against all the rest, So that the Consuls and LL. of the Councill would but do their endeavour, to B "Win unto the State and Senare, some certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compass all, The Senators being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both all ingeneral would courteously fainte and friendly intrear the Tribunes, and also in particular as many of them as had been Confuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendship, and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well content to employ the Tribunes authority to the good and falety of the Common weale. So by the help of foure Tribunes, against one that hindred the good of all, the Consulstook muster of the souldiers. Then set they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Harrisia they came to aid and fuccour; not formuch for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the puissance of Rome C through intestine and civill diffention, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Diets and Allemblies of the States of Heruria, the Princes and Peers gave it out and laid, That the Thespeeches power and greatness of the Romans was everlatting, if through mutual discord they warred not of the Tusan to among themselves: which hath been found the only bare of weathy and stourthing Cities, their Countries in their Countries of the Countries where y mighty Empires became mortall and subject to a finall end, "Whichmitchief (fay "they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the fage advise and prudent government of the Senate, partly by the patience and long inflerance of the Commons: "but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain: seach part have their feverall Magistrates and laws by themselves; At the first, however they "were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the mustering of fouldiers, yet in war they would Be hold together, and obey their Captains. Howfoever they fated at home in the City, were the strength of the week of the rout of order, yet to long as martiall diffipline was on foot and took place, they strength of the route of the week of far our of order, yet to long as martiall diffipline was on foot and took place, they might be reclaimed and all tropbles staied. But now, the former use and cultome of dislobeying "Magistrates within the City, is taken up by the Roman souldiers in the very Camp, For no "longer fince than the last war of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole Army agreed of their own accord not forced by any extremity that they were put unto, for to give the Veientians, as much as in them lay, even after they had loft the field, the entire victory and honour of the day. For they abandoned their enigns, left their Generall alone in the skirmish, and "against his will, retired themselves into the Camp. And surely, if they hold on fill this course, "Rome may be won by means of her own fouldiers: there needs no more to do, but to proclaime "and make a flew of war: For even the very destinies and gods themselves would performe all "the rest. Upon these hopes and deep perswasions, the Tuscans, who afore were wont otherwhiles to have the better, and sometimes to take the worse in their wars, put themselves in arms. The Roman Confuls likewise were in feat of nothing else so much, as of their own power, their own force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and shamefull example, and that lewd part plaid in the last war: lest peradventure they should put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore in to doubtfull and perillous a cale, they held off fight, and kept themselves within their Camp, if haply time and fpace would affwage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaime them to good and reasonable order. The enemies herear, as well Veientians as the other Tuscans, made Fthe greater halle, and were more tharp fet, and provoked them to the field: first by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the lat, feeing they could not prevail, they fell to rating and railing one while upon the Confuls them-felves, another while upon the whole Army, in these and such like terms: "A gay matter indeed, felves, another while upon the indeed, felves, and a proper device to talve their cowardite, and under a colour of civill different on to cloak their "and a proper device to talve their cowardite, and under a colour of civill different on to cloak their "feariulness and the Confuls forfooth mittrust more the faithfulness and loyalty of their fouldi-"ers in service, than they doubted their valour and sufficiency of service. Mary, here is indeed a " new kind of muriny, What? Armed men to hold their peace and fit fiill? Hitting them in their "treeth besides, with their new start-up rising and late sprung base beginning letting sty against them "lies and truths, one with another, and spared nor, For all this foule flir they kept, flouring and G reviling them under their very trench; and hard at their gates, the Confuls themselves were not one jot troubled, But the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for shame of these reproachfull terms, was mu h distempered : and one whiles wholly gave over to reg. rd and thinkeupon home troubles and diffentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Anon again, they would not in any cale gratifie the Nobles and Confuls, not with them good fincels. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Confuls within strove together in their hearts: untill at length forrain occasions got themastry over them: so proudly, so insolently the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troups H to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and fignall of bettell. The Confuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and debrous: but this defire was to be kept back and diffem led, and thereby argmented: to the end, that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might set the souldiers on, and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much halle: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come; to give battell: they mult hold themselves contented, and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be to hardy as to fight: and who to ever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they I would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dismissed. And the less willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and let upon a battell. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were inkindled and inflamed to much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and insult upon them safely without danger. For why? The Confuls durit not trust the fouldiers with weapon in hand: " now were their mutinies come to, the "height and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Domi-" nion was at an end. Prefuming confidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates, eredoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear al-" faulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other fide hold no longer & endure this con- K tumely and indignity, but came running from al parts of the camp unto the Confuls. And now not leithrely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions, but all at once on every fide plied them with outcries and clamors. Now was the matter come to ripenels, yet flow were the Coff, still and hold off. Then Fabius seeing the tumult in reased & that for fear of a mutiny his brother Consulhad yie ded already, caused hience to be made by found of trumpet, and thus he spake . "I know full well O Manl.us, that these sellows are able to win the victory : but that "they will so do I know not, and they them, hes have caused me to doubt. I have therefore set "down my reft, and fully refolved not to gi e the fignal of battell, unless they sweat to return out-" of the field with victory. Once did the fouldiers in battell deceive a Coff of Rome: but the gods "in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flavolesus a Centurion, one of the formost that cal- L. The same oath after him took the whole army,e-"very man against himself. Thus when they had sworn the trumper sounded. Then buckle they them:eives toward battell, full of anger full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscans revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that we've so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day, as well the Commons as the Nobles, But the name of the Fabii, the Fabii I say passed all the rest and wan the spurs. Who in this piece of service purposed to gain again the hearts of the Commons which in many civill contentions were fet against them, And so they embattelled themselves. The M enemies likewise both the Veientians and also the Tukan legions were nothing behind, as making almost fure reckoning that they should be fought withall no more than the Equianshad been, Nay they were in hope of lome greater di-order amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion so doubtinil they would play a more shamefull part, and shew their, leaders a beaftly cast, But it fell out far otherwise. For never in any other war afore, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: 10 much had they of the one fide with spitefull taunts and reproaches netled them, and the Confuls on the other fide with their long delaies whet them on. Scare had the Tul. ans any time to put themselves in bettell array, but at the very first encounter and shock, catting their javelins carelesly from them (1 know not how) rather than levelling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with N their fwords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabii among the formost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their countrimen a brave fight, and a noble example to follow. Where Q. Fab us who had been Conful the third year before, the leader and forwardest of them all whiles headvanced himself and rushed amongst the this kest of the Veientians and scussed with many of them together, was not aware of his deadly enemy fo near: but behold a certain Tufcan, a mighty man of frength and skilfull at his weapon, ran him through the breaft with his fword. Which was not so soondrawn to th of his body, but Fabius fell down headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabrus the Conful flepped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: 'Why, fouldiers (quoth he) is the oath ye took to run away and retire thus in- o "to the Camp? And are ye more affraid indeed, of these most dustardly enemies, than of Ju-"spiter and Mars, by whom ye iware? But I. who was not iworn at all, will either make return with victory, or else O Q. Fabins, fighting here by thee. I will live and die by thy fide. To whom, Cafo Fabius, who the year afore was Conful, replied again: "Think you brother, with "theie words to mike them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom

"they have sworn. And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house, fide being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Conful in the other wing bestirred himself, and did for his part as valiantly; Where hapned almost the like fortune. For as in the one wing the fouldiers followed Q. Fabius, fo in this they cheerfully went with the Conful himself Mantius, chafing the enemies afore him as discomfited. And when he was fore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battel, his men supposing him to be slain, drew back, and had indeed lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Conful with certain Cornets of horiemen, galloped amain into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Conful was living: and that him-B felf who had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to affift them, and so uphe'd the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink. Manlins alto, to encourage his men, shewed himself in open fight. Thus the knowledge and presence of the two Consuls made the souldiers take heart afresh. Herewithall besides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker, because they trusting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for inccour and inpply, and ient them away to affaile the Camp. In the insprising whereof, finding no great ado and small refissance, whiles they had more mind to rifle for pillage, than to fight for the victory, they loft time. In the mean space the Roman Triarii, who were not able to hold out the first assault and entrance, having dispatched to the Consuls certain messengers, to give knowledge in what terms they flood, cast themselves round in a ring, and retired themselves to the Pratorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Manlius the Conful being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate set (ertain fouldiers in guard: and fo enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tufcans being in this desperate case, fared more like mad men than hardy fouldiers. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find iffue and to escape, and had made fundry offers and attempts in vain: behold one troup of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Conful, who by reason of brave and goodly armour was a fair mark, charged upon his own person. The first volley of their shot was received by those that flood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Conful himself was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, and all the rest were discomfitted. Whereupon Conful stain. D the Tufcans took more heart unto them, but the Romanswere fo diffressed, that they ran all about the Camp ingreat fear. And in extream jeopardy had they been but that the Lieutenants caught up the Conful his body, and made passage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth and dismarched disorderly, untill they light upon the other Coniul presently after his victory: where they either fell again upon the edge of the fword, or were feattered and put to flight. This brave Victory thus atchieved, was heavy yet and for rowful for the death of two to noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Consul returned this answer: "That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the passing good service Fabrus refuperformed in that war, in case an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himself, feeing that his house grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q, Fabias, and that the "Common-wealth was half fatherless as it were, for the loss of a Conful, he would not accept the Lawrel so deformed and foully blemished, both with publike and private sorrow. This Triumph thus by him refused, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world. By which we may fee that glory despised in due time returneth otherwhiles in greater measure. Then folemnized he with great honour the oblequies one after another, first of his fellow Conful, and then of his own brother. And he himself made the funeral Orations for them both. Buc so as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himself away with the greater part. And not unmindful of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Confulthip, namely, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the cure of his hurt and wounded fouldiers among the Senators. With most of them the Fabii were charged, and of F none were they better tended and looked unto than of them. Whereupon the Fabii now waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common-wealth good : and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as wel as of the Nobles, Cafo Fabius was created Conful, with T. Virginius; Whose principal care above all was this, even before war, before musters, before all things elie, that seeing now in some measure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that, with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons should prefer the law Agraria, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, and go in hand first themselves to perform their part, and shew their bounty: namely, in parting the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the Senators could not hear of that ear, but milliked of the motion : yea, and some of them complained and faid, that the lively spirit, and couragious disposition of Caso, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glory, grown to be toyish and full of vanities. And there an end

ging and ipoiling as he went. The Æquians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns, and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field lought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashnels of the other Conful: and had not Cafe Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly lost, From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field &take to their Cities: when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone they would make excursions and waste the country. Thus plaid they mock holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as I the Romans could neither all wholly rest careless and secure for them, nor yet go through sitch, & make an end once for all with them. Befides, other wars were either prefently at hand, to wit, from the Agnians and the Volicians, who could no longer fit ftill, than untill their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeature was over-past; or else the Sabins, never other but enemies, yea, and all Hetruria, were like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts, oftner than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might no time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while otherwhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabir unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wife: "My Lords of the Senat, "the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the K "frontires, than great forces for expedition. As for you, see ye to other wars. Let the Fabii alone "to deal as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at cour own proper cost and charges, to maintain and mannage that war, as appropriate and pecu-The linage of "culiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Consulbeing come out of the Senat house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court, expecting the Senats decree, And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls door, they departed from thence home to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up L to the skie, faying, "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The "Veientian war now is become (fay they) a privat charge, and requireth the power and force on-" ly that privat persons could make. O that there were two such families more in Rome of that ec fromack and valour: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand, and another the Æqui-"ans, Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might foon be subdued, and the people of Rome " fit fill the while and reft in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rendezvous aforesaid, as they were commanded. Then came the Conful forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole bloud and linage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the midst of them, cansed the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in num- M ber, or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and fix, all nobly descended, of one stock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a fage and prudent Senate would have refused at any time as unfufficient, to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus furnished with the force and firength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatning and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. Therefollowed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, casting in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor sear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing: another, of the common people, moved with a carefull regard, and aftonied again in a favourable applante and admiration of their enterpaile, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant N Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour; God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and defignments; and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Confulfhips triumphs all rewards and honourable dignities what foever. And all the way as they paffed along the Capitol the Castle and other Temples they belought the gods, as many as were prefented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchfafe that squadron to be attended upon with good success and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in safety to their native country and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made, Then fet they forward on their journey leaving Janus Church on their right hand, taking the ungracious and unlucky way from the gate Carmentalis, untill at length they came to the river * Cremera. That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in and there to plant a garri- O Fossa Vaica, son, After this were L. Amilius and C. Servilius made Confuls. And so long as they adventured no farther than forraging the Country, the Fabii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort; but all their frontier parts and marches wherethe Tuscan Territoryadjoyneth to the Roman they to fcoured and traversed, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in fafety, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then furceased they a while, but it was not long from wasting and spoiling. By which time both the Vejentians had gathered

A a power out of Hetruria, and affaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Roman Legions, under the conduct of the Conful L. Emilius, encountred the Tuscans in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themselves in order of battel: so suddenly at the very first skirmish, whiles the files were entring into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the inccours and supplies a placing and disposing in the rereward, a Cornet of Roman horse charged them so hotly on the flank, that they had not room and space, either to begin fight, or to keep their flanding fure. Thus were they discomfited, and chased back as far as Saxa rubra, i.e. Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained fee their inbred inconstancy fo naturally engrafted) they were weary of it, and repented thereof, B before the Roman garrison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabii once again skirmished with the Veientian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inrodes only, and fudden violent incursions into the Territories but fundry times they encountred with banners displaied, and joined battell in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those daies) of all the Tuscans. This took the Veientians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity. But afterwards they devised to lay trains, as occasion should serve, and entrap their serce and hardy enemy: and well apaid they were and rejoyced, that the Fabii upon the good success that still followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering they would drive cattel in their way, but yet fo, as they might cem to light upon them by chance. The ruftical peafants made fliew as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields wast : yea, and the companies of fouldiers tent out to restrain and stav their ipoiling, made shew of running away, pretending oftner they were afraid than they had cause indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time set so light by their enemies, and thought so well of themselves, that they beleeved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatfoever. This conceit and hope of theirs fet them fo affoat, and made them to bold, that espying upon a time cattel far from Cremera; (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might descry armed souldiers of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horse neck. And when unadvisedly without forefight, they were patt the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to D pass, and were firaging here and there disorderly, driving the cattel away, which gadded in and one, as their manner is when they be leared and affrighted, then suddenly start the enemies all at on e out of the ambushment: so as both before and behind, and on every side they were beset and environed with enemies. At the first the very houting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shot from all sides. And as the Tuscans gathered themselves together, the Fabii were foon hemmed within a tound battallion of enemies, standing armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them in fo much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their arraies were thrust to thick together in so straight a compass, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tulcans to carry a greater shew. Then forbeating to fight as they first intended, E onevery handalike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thereto they endeavour with might and main, body and armour; and with a pointed pattel wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, ri-singup with an easie ascent. From whence at first they made resistance with and they their ground: but soon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they shad some time to breath themfelves, and to take heart again after fo great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better if the Veientians had not fet a compais about the hill fide, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And so were the Fabii flain every man, and not one of them elcaped, yea, and their fort overthrown The Fabii all p and rafed. Three hundred and fix there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the flain. name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encrease, as out

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow happed, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Confuls. Menenius was fent forthwith against the Tuscans, puffed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then also he fought unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprised and got the Janiculum, and the City had furely been befieged, (confidering that befides war they were greatly diffressed for want of victuals, for the Tuscans were passed over the Typer) but that

Where albeit the Romans got but very small * Hope, odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wonted courage prepare the fouldiers to better fervice in the battels enfuing.

Now were A. Virginius and Sp. Servilius created Confuls. The Veientians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still. And from the Janicalum as from a fortreis and place of fafe retreat, they would make excursions out into the Territory of H Rome all about, and neither cattel nor country people could any where be in fafety for them But atterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had caught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cattel, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and train them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambulcado laid for them, And the more they were, the greater was their flaughter, Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tyber in the night ica on they gave the attempt to make an affault upon the Camp of the Conful Servilim. But being discomfied, and many of them slain, the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janiele. Straight after this, the Conful alio passed over Tyber, and en- I campeth himselfiltrongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by Sun tifing, so venturous he was by reason of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and vichals, which drave him to take he cared not how rash and dangerous couries, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition) full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the steep hill of the Janiele, and charged the enemies hold: but being fet back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies; yet by occasion that his fellow Conful came in the while to rescue, he and his Army both were saved: and the Tuscans enclosed between both hofts, were forced to turn their backs, both to one and the other, and were killed every, mothers fon. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn K and victual: both for that there was some grain brought out of Campania, and also because the oldstore that was hoorded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in sear of dearth

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be busie again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, fince they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to sollicite and insect the Commons, with their venome and poyton, the Law Agraria: inciting them against the Nobles that gains aid it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Considius and T. Genutius, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an inditement, and fined T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremera: for that, he being Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this L danger he soon stopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and took his part, no leis than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they fet a fine on his head of * 2000 Asses. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, into such a melancholick fit for shame of this disgrace, that he sell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining sickness which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble to wit, Sp. Servilius, so soon as he was out of his Consulship at what time as C. Nautius, and P. Valerius were Confuls. In the beginning of whole year the Tribunes L.Ceditius and T. Statius, called him straightwaies to his answer. Who sustained the violence of the M Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his own intreaty and the praiers of the Nobles, but bare himfelf confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grace wherein he flood. Blamed he was likewile, and charged for the battel with the Tulcans at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publike danger, so now in his own private peril, by refuting in a bold and from speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and calling in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers means the Commons being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrates and Laws, whereby at this day they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he stood in. The testimony of his Colleague Virginius stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness, N made him partner with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Menenius (so a tered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and struck it dead sure.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad; to whom the Sabins also had joyned their power. Whereupon the Conful P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he set upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the wals of their confederates; and put such a terrour amongst them, that whilesthey ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it happed that the gate which he first advanced his ensigns against, was won. And within the trench small fight there was, but O moreman-flaughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran hastily to their weapons, as if Veii had been surprised. Some make speed to succour the Sabins: others do what they can to assail the Romans, who were wholly bussed about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, disordered, and withdrawn from their purpose: but afterwards they themselves advanced their banness, and made head against the one side and the other. mans, forced to abandon their tents : and befides the recovery of their own goods again, at thieved a great and rich booty. Notwithstanding allthis, the Consul Nantius was lent from Rome against the Volkians. They were not well pleased, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of B the Romans. He ipared not to work all the milchief he could, all abuse and spight possible against the Volkians: yet could not they be brought to fight a let field. Then incceeded L. Furias; and C. Ma:lins:Confuls, To Manlins fell the charge of the Veientian Province, Howbeit, was, there was none at all. But at their own fute, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enjoyned to find corn and fouldiers pay. Peace was not so toon procured abroad, but presently enjued difford at home. For at the initigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were fet a madding. But the Confuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius flood, refitted all they could. And when the Confuls were ounce out of their Offi.e, Genutius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrefted L_{Favius} and them : and L. Emilius with Opiter Virginius enter their Confulfhip. In some Annals or yearly re- c. Mantius en-C cords I find Vop feus Julius Conful instead of Virginius, But in this year, who foever then were Confuls, "Furius and Munlius being indited beforethe people, went about arraied in vile apparell and

"mournful weed to the younger fort of Senators, as well as the Commons persuading, advising, firances to the and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of puny Nobles "Common-weal, And as for the Confuls rods born afore them, their purfled robes with purple, "and chair of state, they should esteem no otherwise of them than of the pageants carried in a "funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and entigns they were but destined to " death: much like to beatts adorned with facred white ribbands and labels, appointed to facri-"fice. But if the sweetness of a Consulship were such let them consider now withall, and perswade "themselves, that it is become private and overswaied with the power of the Tribunes, and that o "the Conful, as if he were the Tribunes serjeant, must do all at his beck and command. For if he "quetched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing ce elle in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him fet before his eyes the exile of Cn. Mar-"tins, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incenied with their speeches, from thenceforth began to confult and confer together, not openly and in publike council, but privatly, and apart from the privity of many. And when they were refolved once upon this point, that thole ecution the most audacious designments what loever, there wanted not one or other to give counfel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons give attendance devoutly in the E Forum, in greatexpectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvelmuch, that the Tribun Genutius came not down in place: and suspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay they imagined that he durst not for the great men and thie! Magistrates of the City: and to they complained that the common cause was for lorn and betraied. At the last they that kept about they complained that the common cause was for our and betractory the tark dead, Givenius a the door & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home stark dead, Tribune of the Which news being once notifed through the affembly, mark how an Army is disperfed and scattered when their General is flain, even foin all the world the Commons flipt affide every one forme ple, murdered one way fome another. But above all others the Tribunes were in bodilytear being this by their in his baule by fellow taught how little help or none at all, their facred and redoubted Laws afforded. The No-the practice of accused parties now in trouble should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook : then the cruellest advice, and hardest course that could be delivered best pleased them and for to put in ex-

bles could not diffemble this their joy, nor ute it with moderation but flewed it excellively and fo fo little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not feem culpable in the action; but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a mitchief Uponthis their victory fo shameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publishing of a muster: and whiles the Tribunes were in this feare danned the Confuls without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes filence and fitting fill then at the Confuls rule and imperious government: faying, "Farewell freedom " now, farewel liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is "both dead and buried together with Genutius Now they ere togo in hand and bethink them-" felves of some other course, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing

6 " they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon, the only way was for the Com-"mons to trust to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Wheras therefore, there gave arren-"dance upon the Confuls 24 Listores or Vergers, Commoners all and no better, none more con-" remptible and base minded if they met with those that would set them at maught: they might thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were " so dread and terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with these speeches: there was a Sergeant fent from the Confuls to one Volero Publilius a Commoner, who because he had

Volero Publilibe preft a foulbeen a Leader in the field of certain bands, pleaded his immunity for being a common fouldier a-H gain. Volero calleth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to refcue him, the Confuls commanded the man to be stript out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready for to scourge him. Then quoth Volero, "I appeal unto the people, seeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citi-"zen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their presence, than be murdered themselves by "you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on ftill, the more cruelly fell the Lictor to cut and flice his apparell for to uncase him. Then Volero being himself the stronger man, and affifted withall by some whom he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the mainest out-cry and loudest noise of his adherents, that sumed and chased in his behalf, thither retired he, to shroud himself among the thickest, crying: "I appeal and beseeth the I "Commons of their protection and succour. Help Citizens, help fellow-souldiers. Never stay "and wait for the Tribunes, until they come, who have themselves need of your affiliance, Hereat folk were raifed and gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battel. A four piece of work was toward, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honeity. When the Confuls in this so great a broil and storm of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soon by experience how slenderly guarded against danger, the Majesty of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Lictors were beaten, misused, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peeces, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senat house, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appealed, they affembled the Sena- K tors together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, and the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharp censures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to let the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rashness of the Commons, And the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinarius and P. Furius were Consuls. Who contrary to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exercised his Tribuneship in molesting and vexing the Confuls of the former year, preferred the publike cause before his own private grievance, and gave not the Confuls fo much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people, That the Magistrates of the Commonalty might be created in a ward-Leet, or Assembly of the Tribes L and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the first fight seemed nothing hainous, passed a matter of no small consequence, but such as abridged the Nobles of all power and authority, to create Tribunes whom they would by the suffrages and voices of their vassals and favourites. But when the Senators resisted with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing and plausible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Confuls or of Senators could be brought to joyn in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to cross it: the business, norwithstanding in it selfe so weighty to wield, and so hard to be compassed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other fide, suppofing the matter would now come to a final triall once for all, created for their Conful Ap, Clas- M diss, the ion of Appins: who even for the old contentions maintained by his father, who was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quincius. At the very beginning no matter was treated of before that Law. But as Volere was the first deviser and broacher of it, so his fellow Letterius was the more earnest and hor maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The stouter he was besides, by reason of his great military glory, for that in those daies there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went straight to the substance of the Law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbare to inveigh against the Consuls person, Lettorisis began his speech with challenging Appins and his house, as most proud, and cruelly affected to the Commonalty of Rome: avouching earneftly, "That the Nobles had made, not a Conful, but a butcherly tor- N "mentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough-hewn fouldier, and not used "to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to express his mind as freely as he would : and "fo his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quirites, I cannot fo readily deliver that "in my speech, as I can make that good indeed which I have spoken: Be you here to morrow, and " in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die for it before " you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or hall first. The Consuls and Nobility abode still in the affembly of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Law. Then commanded Letterius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility stood still, and gave no place to the Tribunes Officer. Then willed Lettorius fome of them to be attached. But the Conful Appius replied again, O "That a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: forasmuch as he was a Magistrate, control the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himself of his absolute power (Consul "though he was observing the custome of his ancestors, command any man to avoid for that the "usual form of words ran thus, May it please you my, Masters, O Quirites if you think good, to depart. Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of fcorn and contempt, to outface

Letterins, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and fer into an heat, fendethan fed that Magi-frates of the fen in a Tribe-Leet, or ward-Affembly, cal-led, Tributa comilia-

was but a private person without command, without Magistracy, And doubtless the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the assembly rose up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune against the Conful: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appins notwithflanding flood fliffely to it fill, and abide the brunt of this tempettuous florm; neither had this broile flaid without some bloudshed, in case Quintim the other Conful, had not fet some of the Aldermen that had been Confuls, to get his brother Conful by force (if otherwise it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles himself was in hand, "one while with the Commons, to appeale their fury, by way of intreaty and with fair words, otherwhiles befought the Tribunes to break up the affembly, pertivading with them to take "more leifure in this their heat and anger for that time and space would abridge nothing of their " power, but would joyn counsel and advice thereto: concluding withal, that both Nobies should "be ruled by the people, and the Conful ordered by the Nobles, Hardly and with much ado were the Commons quieted by Quintins, but far more trouble had the Nobles to still the other Conful. At the length, when the affembly of the people was dismissed, the Consuls called the Senat together, Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger according as the one or the other (waied among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaime their mind from violent couries, and lagely with deliberation to confider of the matter: fo much the more their hearts went against all contention, and farther strile: infomuch, as they yeelded Quintins C hearty thanks, that by his travel between parties, the discord was well allaied. And to Applies they were petitioners, "That he would be contend, that the majesty of the Confull might be no greaer than would fland with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for their part would needs have all, and the Conful on the other fide draw all to them; between this "this plucking and haling there was no ftrength left in the midit: and to conclude, the Commonweal was rent; torn, and difmembred between the rulers therof: who strove rather for the mana-"ging and rule, than for the lafery and preservation of the State. Against whom Appins replied with a folemn protestation before God and man, and faid, "That the weal publike was aban-"doned, forlorn, and betraied by nothing else but foolish sear: that the Senat wanted not a Con-" ful but the Conful wanted Senators: who now yeelded to harder conditions than they had be-

D " fore time in mount Sacer, Howbeit overweighed at length by the general confent and accord of the Nobles, he was content : and so the law passed quietly, was by royall consent authorised. Then The sortiand and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices, lawenacted, Pifo writeth that there were three more made to the other as if there had been but twain before: and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit C. Sicoius, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, Sp. Icilius, & L. Mecilius. Then had the Volicians and Equians, between the civil fedition of the Romans, & the beginning of war harried & wasted the country: that in case the Commons had made an insurrection, they might have retired to them as to a fure place of receit & refuge. But when all was husht & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward.

Appius Claudius was sent against the Volkians: and to Q intins fell the Province of the Aquians. The same rigorous severity continued Appias still in warfare, that he used at home in the City but fo much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated, more than his father had done afore, feeing he, was overfivated, and had taken the foil at their hands : and being the only Conful opposed against the Tribunes power, yet maugre his head, the law passed clear away, which the former Consuls his predecessor, with less ado, nor with to great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindred and staid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell flomack of his by kind, for to plague and punish his fouldiers with imperious and lordly command. But to fet they were to spurn again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed doing all things that they did lazily flowly frowardly, and stubbornly. Neither bashed they for shame, nor stood in awe for fear. If his will was they Fi hould march on apace, they would on let purpole go fair and lorly: If he encouraged them in proper perion to intend their business they would all of them slack their former service, whereun- Themuting to they were entred of themselves; whiles he was in place, they would hang down their heads and disoeder to they were entred of themselves. Whiles ne was in place, they would hard down their hearts. So as that fouldiers to invincible flomack of his against all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve here.

Appin claudia at. And wen he saw that all the shrewdness and rigour that he used was in vain, and that now mither Gehe could do no good with his fouldiers, he fell to che king the Captains and Centurions, faying, nerall. They had spoiled and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting-wise nicknaming them Voleroes. All these doings were the Volcians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should find the Roman G Army as froward and disobedient, as they had been against Fabius. And to say truth they were more crooked and unruly with Appius than with Fabius a great deal, For they were not only unwilling to have the victory as Fabius his Army was, but also desirous to lose the victory and be overcome. Being brought forth and fet in battel array, they shamefully took their heels and fled into their tents: and never made head and relistance, before they law the Volscians with banners displaied, advancing against the munitions of their Camp, and a foul flaughter committed upon the tail of their rereward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very necessity, that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet so, as it H was very apparant, that the fouldiers paffed for nothing elie, but only to fave the Camp for being won: for some of them rejoyced at their own loss and deseature, Whereat, the stout stomack of Appius was nothing daunted nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruelly with them, and thereupon summoned a general assembly. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals, and Colonels, came running unto him advertising him in no case to try masteries, and to inforce his authority. The very ground and trength wherof refleth wholly in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the fouldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the affembly : but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to diflodge and remove out of the territory of the Volicians: moreover, that the enemy now Master of the field, was but a while since ad- I van ed to the gates and rampier, and well near possessed of them: whereby, they were not only to fuspect, but might evidently ice before their eyes some great matter toward of dangerous confequence. Whereupon at last he was over-ruled and (for almuch as his fouldiers thereby should gain nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the affemby for that time : and after proclamation made to fer forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he cauled the trumpet to found the remove, and to march away. The Army being gone out of the Campand ready to be let in order of a march at length, the Volicians who were gotten up by the fame found of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the rereward: the noise whereof passed from thence to the vanguard, & so disordered the enfigns, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be K brought into battel array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away; and diforderly in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcaffes and armors that lay on heaps, and to escaped; and never thay they their flight, untill the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Comul having called his fouldiers together that were run away fo feattering, (for with all the speed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of fecurity. Then he called them all together to an affembly, and inveighed bitterly, and not without just cause, against the whole Army, as having betraied the discipline of war, and forsaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many foundiers as were unarmed, as many enfign-bearers as had not their enligns, the Centurions also, and those that received double allowance, and for sook their L bands and companies, he caused to be k ourged with rods & to lose their heads. The whole number besides, were by lortithed, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in wide Carol. Sig. the expedition against the Equians, the Consuland his fouldiers, strove to exceed one another in currefie and kindneffes, Quintus was by nature mild and chearful, and the cruelty of his brother Conful, that never fped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the Quintus belo. Conful, that never iped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the ved of his soil- General and his Army consorted thus together, the Equians durit not constront them, but suffered their enemies to range all abroad and torrage the country: fo as in no former wars got they greater bootie from then e: and all was bestowed among the souldiers. Over and besides these gratuities, they had their due praises and so emn commendations, wherein souldiers take no less delight than in rewards and gitts. So that Army returned home better affected to their General, M and also to the Nobles for their Generals lake: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other Army alordly master. This year thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war: with grievous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribe-Leet, A matter of more note, in respect of their victory that entred into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Leet it felf lost more credit by excluding the Nobles out of that affembly, than either the Commons got firength, or the Nobles did forgo thereby. But more troublefome was the year following, whiles L. Valer in & T. A. mylim were Confuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agraria, and also for the arraignment of Appins Claudens, Whom, being a most bitter adversary of that law, and a great maintainer and uphoider of those that possessed and held the common N lands, as if he had been ever a third Conful, M. Duellius and C.S. coins arrested and endited, Never before that day came to the bar, a perion to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Com-Appin claudi- mons: charged with so many wrongs done of his own so many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him. The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured to earneftly nor flrained themselves to much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat the maintainer and upholder of their port and dignity, a man ever oppo'ed against all the troubletome broils of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prey to the Commons in their anger and only for that he had overshot, and passed himself in hear of contention, But of all the Senators that ever were, Appins Claudius of himself alone was he, that cared not a rush, either for Tribune or Commoner nor yet for his own arraignment. No mena- O cing thre its of the Commons no earnest prayers of the Senators could once make him, I fay, not to change his apparel and in humble manner to feek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor fo much, as when he came to answer for himself before the people, one whit to mo life and let fall (as it were) that rough and fharp kind of speech that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same sowre countenancestill, the very same frowardness and crabbedness of vilage, the lame spirit of boldness in his apology and defence. Insomuch, as many of the Commons were no less afraid of Appius standing prisoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they hadbeen of him, fixting as Conful in his ivory chair of effate. In pleading of his cause, he spake briefly and at once to the point, with the tame acculatory spirit that he had ever used in all his pleas and actions. With his boldnels and refolute constancy, the fo amazed both Tribunes and Commons, that they themselves deferred the day of giving sentence, and suffered afterward the suit to hang and depend fill undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he fickned and died. Whole funeral praises when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, Ap. Clauding the Commons would not fuffer, that the death of fo worthy a man, should be defrauded of the dieth. due honour and tolemn obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commen-B dation of the mannow dead, as they did afore to his acculation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave.

The same year Valerius the Consul made a voiage with an army against the Æquians, and seeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to affail the Camp: but there feel luch a terrible form and tempel from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps that he was disappointed of his enterprise. And that which made it more strange and wonderfull, he had no soonersounded the retreat, but the weather proved so fair and calm again that he made some scruple and matter of confcience, to give a second assault unto the trench, as if it had been defended by the speciall power and providence of God. So, all the heat of war turned to the watting only of the Countrey. The other Conjul Amilias warred with the Sabins. And even there also, because C the enemies kept within their walled towns, the Territories were spoiled, But afterwards, the Sabines raifed with the fitting, not only of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good towns and burroughs, whereof in those parts there were many and those well peopled, encountred the torragers: and after a doubtfull skirmin, they departed alunder, and the morrow after railed their Camp, and retired themselves back into a place of more lecurity, which the Consultaking for a fufficiens argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them so, and dislodged likewife, without any end of the war. During these wars, and whiles discord continued in the City at home, were T. Numities Prisons and A. Virginius created Confuls. Now feemed it that the Commons would no longer abide the deferring of the Law Agraria. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the utn most by extremity they took knowledge partly by the smoke and slame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volicians were near at hand. Which occurrent repressed and kept down the sedition which was now come to ripeness, and ready to break forth. For the Confuls forced by the Senate immediatly to the war, by taking the serviceable youth with them out of the City reduced the rest of the Commons to more quietness. And the enemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a falle allarm, and fet the Romans in a foolish fear, dismarched away as speedily as they could. Then Numitius went to Anium against the Volcians, and Virginiur against the Equians: where having well-near received a great loss and defeat by a train laid for him : fuch was the prowers and manhood of the foundiers, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Contul had like to be loft. But better was E the conduct and government of the Army against the Vollcians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were difarrated, put to flight, and chased as far as to Antium, a City (for that time) of right great puissance and importance. The Conful durst not assault it, but wan from the Antiates Cenon, another town, but nothing to wealthy. Whiles the Aquians and Volt ians thus amufed the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabins were come robbing and fooiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few daies after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Confuls with two armies were entred in great angerinto their Confines. In the end of the year some peace there was, but disquieted, as at altimes before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a preville and angry fit would not be at the Election of the Confuls. So by the Senators only and their followers, F there were e'ched Consuls, T. Quintius and Q. Servilius. The like year to the former these Consuls had, seditions and troublesome in the beginning: but afterwards upon forrain war, quiet and still. For the Sabins with a running Camp having paffed over the plains of Crestaminans, and put all to fire and word about the river Anio, were chased back, well near from the gate Collina and the walls: howbeit they drave away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattell. Whom the Conful Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battell, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in Howheit he foraged and waited the Country all about to as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchale of many rich prizes of all forts.

Likewise among the Volscians they sped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both G of captainand fouldier. First they joyned battell upon a plain, and fought with very great slaugh- The strategies ter, and exceeding much bloudshed on both fides. And the Romans (who for their small num- of the Consul ber were more apt to feel the loss) had lost ground and dismarched, if that the Consul by ma- Quintum. king a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encourathem and renewed the battell aftelh. And to by giving a new charge, whiles they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Conful fearing again, by preffing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, founded the retreat. Few daies passed between, wherein they refred quiet, as though there had been a fecret truce agreed between them. H In which mean space, a great fort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Equians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night feason. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an affault upon their Camp. Quinting after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this judden allarm arose, and given commandment that the fouldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Hernicks to guard the gates, and caused certain cornettiers and trumpetters on horseback to wind and found before the trench and counterscarpe, and so to hold the enemy in sufpence and expectation untill day-light. The rest of the night all was so quiet within the Camp. that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. This I shew of footmen in their harnels, whom the Volicians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing besides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the found also of their trumpets and horns that made them to fet up their ears, and to stamp and sume outragiously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and fresh, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discomfitted the Volcians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withall. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than scemed to be driven from their flandings, because they had at their backs certain hils, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and lo ave themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, K made a stand. The footmen hardly would be staied, calling and crying to the Conful to follow upon them seeing they were discomitted. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Conful, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the enfigns. Whiles the Conful held off, in a mammering what to do, for as he was affured of the valour of his fouldiers, so he little trusted the ground; they all at once set up a shout, that they would set forward, come what would : and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins fast in the ground, that they might more nimbly getup the steep place, they took their full carreer, and ran up the hill. The Volicians having in their first brunt spentall their darts, and other shot which they had let flie, and made no spare, took up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them, that they annoyed them L fore and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near over-charged had not the Conjul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness and then for their cowardie, and made them for very shame to shake off all sear. First theystood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh shout and outcry. And taking their carreer again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. Whiles they ran on heaps in difaray, both they that fled, and they that followed, hapned both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Voilcians, as M many of them as could elcape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman army conducted and after a few dates siege, was surrendred upon no fresh and new force of affault but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and lois of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

The Third Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the third Book.

Selitions abort the Laws Agraria. The Capitoll taken and held by banilhed persons and flaves. They over flatine and receivered. A firvery and Cesiment was token twice. In the former there were found of Roman Citicae: 124214, be fides or phan children, and fuch as had no children at all as well men as women. In the other following there were 132419. Byon a great overhow received in the war against the Afgaians, L. Quintus Cinc innatus was made Distator: and being in the country at his farme busic about his husbandry, was sent for to the condict of that war. He vanquished and subdued the enemies. The number of the Tribines of the Commons, arose to tentify six years after then first inflictation. The laws of Athens were set from thence by Embalfadours, sent for that purpose; to the establishing and publishing whereof shere were ten personages elected in the room of Consist, which were called Decembers; without any other Magistrates: and this happed in the three bundred and second

A year after the foundation of Rome. And as the Government of the state was translated from Kingsto Coulds: so was it new from the Cossults to the Decembers. They having proposed ten tables of laws, and born themselves modelly in that high dignity, were therefore by the confient of the people, permitted overming still in office the second year. But after they had committed many instant partis shey would not give over their room of Magistracy, but held it fills the third year: until such time as their oblimate and intested rule came to an end, occasioned by the sight such solid successive who being inamounted upon a Virgin-subvened one to make claim unto her as his bondstawewhereupon her sucher Virginius was driven of successive to cache by a kings from a butchers stall next by, and to kill his daughter: as having no other measus to save her from the hards of hims that purposed to a buss be been done unknifelly. The Commons of the measus to save her from the hards of hims that purposed to a buss her body unknifelly. The Commons of the measure of such the measure to save the save their places, and took the means Aventine for their busses and compelled the Decembers to seave their places, and give over their government. Of whom, Appius and one of his Collegues (which two had principally deserved punishment.) were committed to prison, and therebyes her served retruen into handshiment. This book containeth besides the wistorious wars against the Sobins, Vossians, and Equians. And the unbough arbitrement or awards of the people of Rome, who being chosen a Arbitrators between the Ardeast and the Arients, awarded to themselves the Land wheredown the strip and conveyers year.

The third Book of T. Livius.

Frer the winning of Antium, T. Amilius and Q. Fabius were created Confuls. This was that Fabius that only remained alive of all the name that perished at Cremera, Now had Æmilius in his former Consulship perswaded to distribute certain Lands among the Commons, And therefore in this second likewise, both the savorers of the law Agraria were in good hope of the foresaid law: and also the Tribuns supposing verily that now by the help of a Coniul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprifed against the pleasure of the Confuls; took the matter in hand and gave the attempt; and withal, the Conful Hill continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chief and head Magistrat of the City bused D himself, with the Tribuns snits, and was by large giving away of other mens possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heavy load of this action from the Tribuns upon the Conful his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas, there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the year afore under the conduct of T. Quintini: "There might (faid he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City neer adiii joyning, very commodious, and feared by the Sea fide: fo should the Commons without any iii grudging or complaints of the possession of Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City rest in "quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especial officers or Triumvirs for the division of the faid lands, to wit, T. Quintius, Aul. Virginius, and E P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That who oever would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, foon caused lothing: for there were to few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were fain to adjoyn unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land essewhere. The Æquians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a sodain inrode into the territories of Latium, cancelled the same and made it void. But the year next following, Q. Servolius (for he was Conful with Sp. Posthumius) being sent against the Equians, kept a standing camp in the Country about Lusium, But by the reason of a contagious disease or a F plague, that raigned in his army, they were of necessity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabrus and T. Quintius were Consuls. And for almuch as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Equians, he had an extraordinary commission directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither gone with full affired hope, that the very fame of him, and noise of his army, would quiet the Æquians, feut Embaffadors to the Councel of that Nation, with this meffage: "Q. Fabius the Conful, faith, "that as he caried before peace from the Æquians unto Rome, to he bringeth now war to the Æ-" quians from Rome; having now his sword in the very same hand, which he gave unto them be-"fore in friendly manner unarmed. Whose treachery it is and perjury, that is the cause of this, the "Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereaster. Nevertheless, he for his " part, however the case standeth, desireth that the Æquians would yet bethink themselves of their G "own accord and repent rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities and mise-"ries that follow wars. If they would come in therefore and be fory for that they have done, their "submission should be received and they taken into the safe protection of his clemency, whereof " already they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being forsworn; be they well affured that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more "than their enemies to fight against them, These words so little or nothing at all moved any men there, that the very Embaffadors had like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated, yea, and an army withal was fent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings H were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any feariul peril otherwife, raised the other Consui out of the City. So two Consular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out presently by the dint of sword. But the day being (as it fell out) welneer ipent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward : "This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed: "ye fet your battaillons in array against night forfooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need "of more daylight I wis, for the business in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore "at Sun rifing, fee you come again into the field, ye shall have fighting fear not, your hands full. The souldiers netled and galled at these words, retired back into the campuntil the next day, I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail and so for that time they refreshed their bodies with food and sleep. On the morrow io soon as it was day, the Roman hoft being stirring fomewhat more early, itood ready arranged in array: and at length the Æquians likewise shewed themselves in sield. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Roman souldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred; and also the Æquians upon prickt conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trufted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Æquians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers the unruly multitude for all this, were nenight. And being returned within the reproved and blamed their Captains, "That they put the tryal K " of the issue to a set field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpassed "them. As for the Aquians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making in-"cursions and inrodes: and a better and laser kinde of iervice it was, here and there in fundry " places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one gross army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Romes that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This flir, especially coming fo fodainly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their owncamp, could possibly think upon entring into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Befides, the ruftical pealants came in at the gates, crying, and faying, That they were not petty com-L panies, and small handfuls of theeves and rollbers, but (such was their foolish fear, augmenting and making everything greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners displayed full against the City, From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others. & as they heard news from they knew not whom, so they fet them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added iom what of their own, and coyned lies good flore. Here was running, there was crying al'arm & generally such a consuston every where, as if the City had been quite loft. By good hap Quantus the Conful was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and flayed the fear. When the tumult was appeared, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom herectofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gazes. Then he assembled the Senate, and by the authority and assemble to the Nobles, proclaimed M Justitum, or a general cestation or vacation in all courts of law; and went himself forth in person with a power to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Provost of the City: but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Conful performed his affairs passing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, fet upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in diforder) made it a dear booty unto them, even afmuch as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintius into the City made an end of the publick Lawstead, or abovefaid vacation which lasted but four dayes. Then was a Cense or Assement set of mens goods and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a folemn purging of the people, called Luftrum, celebrate by Quintins. And there were numbred of Citizens 124214 polles, over and above men and women that lived fingle, or had no children, and all orphans befides. And among N the Equians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betook them to their flrong Towns, fuffering their territory and villages to be confumed with fire, and spoiled. Thus the Conful, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wafling and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Cost. Aulus Posthumius Albus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fusis, who indeed are rightly named Furii. Which I note, left any man should think they were fundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Cosi, would war with the Aquians: and therefore the Aquians fought for aide of the Ecetrane Volicians, Which being gladly granted and fent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bare these Cities alwayes O against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Herniks having an inckling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Ecerrans were revolted and banded with the Æquians. The Colony Antum likewise was had in jealouly, for that when the Town was loft, many people fled from thence to the Equians, who all the time of the Equian war, ferved in the field, and proved the most hardy founders and fiercest of all others. And now when the Æquians were driven into their Towns, that

A multitude being flipt away and retired to Antum, withdrew from the Romans the allegeance of the Coloners and inhabitants there, who were aiready of their own inclination unfound and not to be truited. But before the matter was come to ripenels, and they entred into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only, and were upon the point to revolt. gave the Coff. in charge to fend for the chief men and held perfons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms A tium thood: who being come willingly enough. without any great intreaty, and convented by the Contuls before the Senate, made an iver to their interrogatories in fuch manner, that they were fent away more suspected, than at their first coming: whereupon they resolved fully of war. Spurius Furius one of the Cost, to whom that B provin e by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Aquians, found the enemy spoiling and wasting in the territory of the Hernicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discovered together) he rashly joyned battell, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driren back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not past all danger and infecurity there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was fo Hreighty befer, and so hotly affaulted, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Herniks fent word both of the infortunate fight, and also how the Conful and his army were befieged. With which news they so terrified the LL, of the Councel, that they granted Posthumius the other Conful the folemn commission, To see to the State, that it sustained no danger and damage. The form of which order and decree, hath been alwayes accounted to fignify tome great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought best it was, that the Consul himself in proper perfon, should abide at home to enrol in the muster book, all those that were able to bear armes: that T. Quintins should be sent as Pro-consul or Vice consul, with a power of consederate Allies to raise the fiege and rescue the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Latines, the Hernicks, and Colony Antum, were commanded to fend unto Quinting, Subitary fouldiers (for so they termed at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in hast and on a sudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmishing, and sundry assaults for certain dayes on each tide were enterprised. For the enemies being more in number, affayed in divers places and fundry wayes to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not sufficient and able to make head at all D turns. For at one time they both made an affault upon the camp, and withal fent out certain of their forces to walt the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could espie any good opportunity to offer it felf, L. Valerius was left behind to defend the City, and Posthinius the Consul was sent out to restrain and withstand the wasting of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was slaked, watch and ward both night and day was let in the City, a good Corps de guard appointed afore the Gates, and fouldiers beflowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in fo great an hurlyburly) for certain dives it was no Term, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this mean while, Furius the Coff. who at the first had quietly endured the fiege and made no refistance, suddenly and at unawares fallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might E have chased them, he made some stay of that, for fear lest on some other side, they would have given affault upon the camp. But Furius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consul his Brother) engaged himself too sar, and upon a hor defire of pursuit and sollowing the chair, neither faw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being shut out from all the rescue, after many essayes made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was flain. The Conful likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight; but as he ran more rashly than warily into the midst of the skirmish, he was fore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado faved by those that were about him, he both disquieted and daunted F the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, lufty, and couragious. Who were to animated and tet on fire, both with the hurt of the Conful, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no force was able to stay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were besieged afresh being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly perishe, but that T. Quintins with a supply of strangers; namely, a power of Latines and Hernikes, came to the reique in time: who charging the Æquians behind, whiles they were wholly bused in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a sally out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a far off, and so inclosed round about a great num-G ber of the enemies. Small mas the flaughter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (stragling here and there and driving their booties afore them) Posthumius, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certain companies and bands of fouldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in disaray, they lighted upon Q sintius as he with the hurt Conful returned with Victory. Then the Confuls army bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them; and was revenged both for their Confuls wound, and also for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many losfes and overthrows were given and taken on each fide for certain dayes. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to fet down precifely the certain num-H ber either how many fought, or how many were flain, Howbeit Valerius Antist boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country $ 300, and of the Æquian robbers, who went up and down spoiling and pilling in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Poffbumius the Cof. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoil fell into the hands of Quintint, were not to quit, nor escaped with the loss of fo few mens lives: for of them the sword devoured 4000, and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 just. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the foresaid vacation or law-steed ended. The skie was seen much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the fearful people vain apparitions, and fantaftical illusions. However it was, for to I avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens presaged, there were proclaimed festival holy dayes for three dayes together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and squadrons of the Latins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for theirgood fervice in this war, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate souldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to succour, were difmissed in manner with ignominy and shame.

Then was the great Leet or affembly held, for the election of Magistrates: wherein L. Ebutins *The first day and P. Servilius were created Confuls: and on the * Calends of Sextilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entred their Confulfilip. A grievous and heavy time it was, and as it fortuned, K a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country, as well among brute beatis as men. And the receiving of the Country peasants with their cattel into the City, for fear of robbing and spoiling, encreased the contagiousness of the sickness so much the more. For, that confuied medly of all forts of bealts, both annoyed and empoiloned the citizens with the uncouth and unusual flink, and also stifled with sultry heat and overmuch watching the rustical people, lying pestered together, and thrust up into close rooms and straight lodgings. The mutual recourse one to help and Minister unto another, and the very catching of the disease, set it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure these present calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a fuddain, the Hernick Embassadors bring word, that the Æquians and Volscians having levied a power joyntly together, were encamped within their limits : and from thence with a migh- L ty army wasted and destroyed their territory. Now, besides that the small assembly in the Senate-house, was to these their allyes an evident token that the City was fore visited with the pefilence, they received also an heavy answer from them, namely; That the Herniks themselves together with the help of the Latins, should defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and visitation of the Gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the fickness decreased in some measure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederats, as they did the year before, and as they had done at all times befides. Thus departed their allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they caried with them home again a worse answer and message, to wit, That they should by themselves sustain that war alone which hardly they were able to support, if they had the power of the Romans to assist them. Long stayed not the enemy in M the Hernicks countrey, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, defolate already (God wor) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes : where meeting with no man at all, no not fo much as any one unarmed, and passing overall the Country, disfurnished not only of Garrisons to resist, but also of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third ftone, i, within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gabes. The Roman Cof Ebutius, was now departed this life, and his brother Cof. Servilius, lay lingring on at the point of death, in small hope of recovery. Most of the peers and principal ancients were insected, and sick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, and welneer all the ferviceable men of war: fo as they were not able to let forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, no nor scarce to keep any ordinary set guard at home N for the defence of the City. The Senators, such as age and sickness would permit, took the charge in proper persons of watch and ward. The Ædiles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to see all well & in good order so that upon them now rested the government of the state, & the Majesty of the Consuls Regiment. Thus when all was forlorn, no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tutelar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preserved the main chance. This made the Volscians and Equians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and spoilings, than in any hostile manner like professed warriors: for so small hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City; so little heart fon uch as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houses, which they descried a far off, and the fight of the tombs and graves so neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and O daunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themselves. What they meant to spend time idly and sit fill without spreadings in a wast and defart Countreys within the mortality and purished air and corruption, both of people and cattel; when as they might as well invade those parts that flood clear and sound, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of * Tufculum: and therewith suddainly at once they plucked up their ensigns, and by cross wayes * Val months passed through the * Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tusculum: and thither turned

A they the whole force and tempelt of the war. In the mean season the Herniks and Latins moved not with pity and compassion only, but asso for very shame, in case they had neither with sood their common enemies, marching to Rome wirh a cruel army, nor relieved their belieged friends; joyned their powers together, and fet forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their fresh tracks and tooting, they encountred them as they came downfrom the hilly Country of Tusculum into the vale of Alsa: Where they made no faving bargain of it, but fought to their loss, to as their fidelity unto their allyes, had but bad succeis for that present. And in Rome there was no less mortality of citizens by the fickness, than there were Maffacres abroad of their allyes by the edge of the tword. For the other Conful, B who alone survived hitherto, now died. There left this lite alfo, other noble personages, M.Vaterius, Titus Virginius, Augurs: and Ser. Selpitius the Curio Maximus. But among the bale and common fort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how far. The Senate now destitute of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandment was given to all men with their wives and children, to go in procession, to pour out their supplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by publick authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filled all the Temples and Chappels. The Dames and ancient Matrons, lying groveling and sweeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and tresses, hanging loose down, humbly belought pardon of the Gods, and an end once of the petilence. Whereupon, C were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious feason of the year, was now well overpast; their bodies by little and little, having escaped the danger of disease, began to recover and wax more healthy.

Then fet they their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain inter-reigns determined or ended, P. Valerius Poplicola, the third day of his Interreign or Regency for the time, createth Confuls L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius Geminus, ot Vetusius, whether ye will: who three dayes before the Ides of Sextilis, began their Consulship. By which time the City was grown to firong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defensive war, but also to enter the field and affail others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertisements that the enemies were passed over into their borders : they made no delay, but readily and willingly promiled their aid, and levied two Confular armies. Veturius was fent against the Volscians, to begin with them, and to war within their own Country. Tricipitinus was opposed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keep them from invalion and walting, and went no further forward than to the Herniks. Veturius at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomfitted and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus whiles he lay still encamped in the marches of the Herniks, missed of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Preneste, from whence they came down into the Champain, and spoiled the territories of Prenesse and Gabes: and from thence they fetched a compass about unto the Mountains of Tusculum. The City of Rome likewise was put in great fear, rather upon the lodain occurrent of this alarm, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Provost or Pre-E sident of the City, who put the youth in armor, diposed guards in places convenient, and made all fafe and in good security. The enemies therefore who had raised a booty out of the parts adjoyning, durft approach no neerer, but cast about with their army and retired: and the further they went from their enemies City, fo much the more careless they were, until they light upon the Col. Lucretius, who by his espials and scouts, was afore that time acquainted what wayes they would take, and was ready also to try battail. So with resolute and prepared hearts, they fer upon them, that with the fodain fear were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they discomfited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drave them within the hollow vallyes, where because they had no ready way to get out, they kept them inclosed on every fide in such fort, that the whole name and nation welneer of the Volcians, there utterly perithed. In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 slain in the fight and chase, and 1250 taken Prisoners alive, and 27 ensigns or barners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great slaughrer certainly there was. The Consul having atchieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same standing camp again. Then pitched both Confuls together, and the Volicians joyntly with the Equians, rallied their Forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire army. This was the third field fought, in that one year, and by the same good Fortune the Romans wan the victory: and having vanquished the enemies, they were Masters also of the camp. Thus the City of Rome recovered her felf, and returned to her ancient good estate. But this happy success in war, immediatly stirred up civil troubles at home. C. Terentillus Arfa, for that year a Tri-In war, immediatly stirred up civil troubles at home. C. Terentillus Arja, for that year a 1112 C. Terentillus G bun of the Commons, supposing in the absence of the Consuls, good opportunity was offered to investment investment.

fet on foot the Tribuns actions, and their proceedings : for certain dayes together gave not over gainst the rebefore the Commons, to accuse the great pride and infolency of the Nobles: but especially he giment of the inveighed against the Consuls Regiment, as being too absolute, and in a free state intollerable. Consuls, "For in name only (quoth he) less odious and hateful it is than that of the KK. but in fact in "s very dead, more grievous and cruel. For why? Instead of one Lord, the City hath received " twain, and those having authority beyond all measure, unlimited and infinit: who being them" selves at their own liberty and unbridled, turned the edge of all fireight and dreadful Laws; yea, H "and the igor of all punishment, against the Commons. But lest this their licentionsness should "continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by vertue whereof thereshould "be five men created, who should fet down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority " of the Coniuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted out over them, the " same should the Consul exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and use their own " will and licentious lust in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles searing, lest whiles the Consuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked. Quin Fabius Pretident of the City, affembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and the Law-giver himself, that if both the Consuls themselves had stood about the Tribun of purpole I to contradict and cross his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for them, to have thundred out, " For he laid fore unto hischarge, that he had lyen in wait, and now " having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to assail the C.W. and the State. "having spied the time to it also peoples as a said the "And in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had sent among them tucna a rivours against the Tibun of the Coyen people with war and pessilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have the coyen people both were dead, and "the City lay bed-rid as it were, in a miferable confusion of all things, he would have made laws "then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and been a ring-leader to Volscians and Æquians both, for to have assaulted the City. For what " might not he have lawfully done by vertue of his place? If the Confuls had either proudly or K " cruelly proceeded against any one Citizen, he might have entred an Action against them, and " convented them fortooth before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been " by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus "did should not cause the Consuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious and intollerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began " now afresh to come unto the old biace, and to be troublesome again. Neither intreated he him "not to go on fill as he had begun. But ye my Matters (quoth Favius) that are the reft of the "Tribuns, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you "have, was brought in for the succour and relief of every particular person, and not to the general " prejudice and undoing of all, Again that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies A. " of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hateful unto you, and will " breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C. W. now forlorn, should thus be invaded er and affailed. Ye shall lose nothing of your own right, I assure you, nay, you shall avoid much " mislike and hatred of men, incate ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribun, to put off "this matter and defer it wholly until the Confuls coming. Why, the very Æquians and Volicithemselves the last year, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague pressed not hardly up-" on us, to profecute any proud and cruel war against us. So the Tribuns communed and perfwaded with Terentillus: and this his commenced fuit or action being adjourned in outward shew, but in very truth let fall quite and disanulled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home, Lucretim returned enriched with a tight great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. Who at M his ery first coming wan him elf more glory, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that every man for three dayes space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no owners to come forth and make claim, was fold in port-fale. By all mens confent, the Conful was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off by reason that the Tribun had not yet done with his law : which was the thing that the Conful thought meet should be first regarded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and also before the people. At last the Tribun yeelded to the Majesty of the Consul, and gave it over. Then was, due honor rendred both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the Volicians and Æquians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other Conful granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N without his fouldiers. The year next enfuing, the Law Terentilla was by the whole Colledge or fellowship of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Consuls P. Volumnius and Ser. Sulpitius to some trouble. And in the same year the skie seemed to be on a light fire, and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did speak. Among other strange wonders it rained flesh: during which showre, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to have matcht it and carried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and escaped their tallons, lay feattered here and therefor certain dayes in such fort, as the sent changed not at all, nor the flesh one jot taken and corrupted, Then the books (of Sibylla) were perused by the Duumvirs deputed over matters of Religion: who fore-told of some dangers to ensue by a Company O of strangers, and gave warning to look lest haply some assault should be made upon the highest places of the City and thereof a flaughter and maffacre enfue. Amongst the rest, warning was given to abiliain from civil discord and mutinies: which the ribuns found fault with, as a devised matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presently to grow. But behold (that the revolution and course of troubles might turn about every year to the same point.) The Herniks bring news that the Volfcians had Æquians for all their wings were well clip-

A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began togather and levy new armies: Item, That in Antium lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the Antiat coloners held their councels and had their meetings in open show, at Ecetra, but Aminus was the principal feat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whattoever. As foon as there news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster souldiers : and that the Confuls should part between them the administration and managing of his war, so as the one should have the charge against the Volscians, and the other against the Equians. But the Tribuns rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people, "That this was but a made marter of the Volkian war, and a tale devised by the Herniks, who were suborned and framed to B " play their parts in the Pageant, and to lerve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the "freedome of she needed of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain prowes & vertue, the Nobility.
"but finely shifted off and dailied cunningly withal, by slye and craity inventions, And for almuch "as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volicians and Equians after so great "flaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of "themselves to wage war, there were, for footh new enemies sought out: A faithful Colony near "adjoyning, was now flandred and defamed: war war pretended for a shew against the guiltless "and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Kome, whom they "meant to drive out of the City in all hafte headlong, furtharged with heavy armor, and so by turning out their poor fellow citizens into banishment, and sending them away, God knows "whither) to be avenged at length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (lay the Tribuns, for they "must think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be troden under soot, unless " whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whiles they remain at home in their houses, "whiles they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not dif-"poffesfied of the City, and take the yoke of servitude upon their necks: assuring them that if " their hearts only served, they should want for no help; and that all the Tribuns agreed and were " of one mind, that there was no cause of ear abroad, no forrain war to trouble them: last of all. "that the very providence of the Gods the year before affured them, that their liberty might with "fafery be defended. These and such like Remonstrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other part, the Confuls causing their chairs of estate to be set, ever in their sight and presence, began to D miffer. Thirherran the Tribuns down in all haft, and direw the whole affembly of people with them. And, to make as it were a proof and tryal, fome few by name were called, and straightwayes began a ftir. For whomfoever the Sergeant by the Comul his commandment arrefted, the Tribuns charged again that he should be let go. And neither side contained within the limits and compass of their commission and rightful authority: but presumed of their might and strong hand, to attain unto their defired purpose. For even as the Tribuns had demeaned themselves in forbidding the muster, semblably the Senators bestirred themselves to stop the law for going forward : which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might affemble. And evermore the brawl began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Halk, for that the Patriti would not endure thus to be let out and excluded. Few or none of the ancients would be present at these troublesome firs, being such as were not to be managed and ordered by sage Councel, but wholly left to the rathness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consuls also were much absent, and forbare to be in place. for fear lest in such a consuled hurliburly their Majefty and dignity, might have been full jeft to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there was among them one Cefo Quintini, a lusty young Gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his noble patentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his body. Besides these good parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by fundry exploits atchieved in wars: He had withal an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tounge, or taller of his hands. This Cafe standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the Frest, as one that in his speech and strength, carried afore him the countenance and authority of all Dictators and Confuls, was the only man that bare off the brunts of Tribuns, and ftorms of the common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty cefo Quintim defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Who oever came within his reach, a bitter adverwas fure to go away throughly beaten, and clean tripped. So asit evidenly appeared, if this fary of the law course might have been allowed, the law had soonbeen checked and overthrown. Now when all the other Tribuns belides were herewith difmayed and welnear daunted. Aulus Virginius alone, being one of their fellowship, was so bold, as to enter an action against Caso, of a capital crime.

By which deed of his, he rather fired, than feared his hot and furious nature. For fo much the more eagerly withstood he the Law, couried and troubled the Commons, and perfectited the Tri-G buis as it were with open war. The plaintiffe in the mean time, luffered the defendant to run on ftill, and with many outrages to kindle more coals of ill will, and hatred upon his own head, and to minister surther matter of crimes to be charged with. And all the while he ceased not to prefer the Law aforesaid, not so much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and set on work the giddy head and humorous vein of Caso. Whereby it came to pass, that many follies often imes

Were committed both in word and deed, by the yonger fort: and evermore the blame light upon poor Cafo: he alone was atwayes charged, because he had been once suspected. But nevertheless hee gainsayed and crossed the Law, And Aulus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Com- B mons with these and such like speeches. "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quirites, that ye may " not now have Cafe your Citizen, and the law which you defire both together. But what mean "I to speak of your Law? It is your liberty that he infringeth and setteth himself against, and in 6 pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Tarquins that ever were. But wait, ye were best, until "he be made a Coniul or Dictator, whom ye fee already, being but a private person, to bear him-"felf so greatly of his strength and boldness, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many soothed the Tribune and faid the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten at his hands : and were forward enough of themselves to set the Tribune on, to proceed in his commenced action against him.

Cafe recommended by many of the Nobility.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come : and it seemed abroad, that all inen verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty confilted in the condemnation of Cafe. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignity and shame, to creep and crouch unto every man, submissively craving their favor one after another. There seconded him his kinssolk and neerest friends, the bett men of the City. Titus Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Conful, spake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own, and a lo of his family, affirmed, that neither in the house and race of Quintii, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever feen fo great towardness, no such shew and itkelihood of ripe and period vertue and prowess as in Cafo: faying, that he had been first his fouldier, and ferved under him, and that with his own eys he had feen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again K Sp. Fusius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himself was in great diffress and extremity, Cafo was fent unto him from Quintius Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good service, as he thought, the Weal-publick at that time was more relieved and restored, then by his. L. Lucretius the Consul last year before glittering in his bright glory to fresh and new, joined with the rest, avowing Cefo partaker with him in his praise-worthy acts: he recounted his brave combats, rehearfed his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiages, and also in the pight field: advising & counselling them, that in any hand they would retain him stil for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a fingular stay of the publick affairs, into what City and State soever he should come, As for that heat and hastiness (quoth he) L which was in him misliked and offensive, age and time would dayly diminish, and bereave him of it : grave and fage counsel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therfore his faults waxed old and faded, his vertues now were in their growth, flourished, and grew ripe unto persection; they should permit so brave, so rare a person, to live fill among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the rest, L. Quimius, furnamed Cincinna us, went another way to work : who not by iterating fill his praises, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildness and youthful demeanor; besought them for his sake at least wife, to give the son as a present to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any person. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modelty and reverence, or for fear. Others complaining how they and M. theirs had been beaten and hardly used at his hands, bewraied and shewed plainly by their shrewd and churlish answers what their judgment was. Besides, the common mislike and malice conceived against the desendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him very neer. And that was this : M. Volscius Fictor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in against him as a witness, and deposed, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths as they made a riot and robbery in the Suburra: where there arose a brawland fray, in which his elder brother, a man wel in years, and not throughly recovered of his fickness, was with a buffet with Cafe his fift fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead : so as he was fain to be had home between mens arms; and as he deemed, of that blow he died : yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and profecute N the law, for fear of the Confuls of these last years. As Volscius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in so much that Case escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and sury of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to priion. The Parnii again by force refifted force. T. Quintus cried out. That he who was under arrest for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who shortly should come to histrial and be judged, ought not before sentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himself, thus violently be missed. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leave he would be io bold as keep him fast in pailon, to be forth-coming at the law day that he who had killed a man, might suffer therefore a cording as the people of Rome should award. Then were the Tribunes called un- O to for their he'p, who by the means of an indifferent de ree then made, shewed their lawful favours with speed. By vertue whereof they forbad expresly, that he should not be imprisoned, but pronounced that it was their wil and pleasure, that the defendant should personally appear, and a piece of money be promised unto the people, in case that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what sum of money should be thought reasonable to be promiled. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilft the Senators fate

A thereupon, the defendant was kept fill in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought good and fet it down, that he should put in sureties. And they bound each surety in 3000 * Asses. *9 lib.7, 1b.6. But how many of these should put in band, was lest to the will and discretion of the Tribuns, who distrib affigned and determined ten and no more. With fo many fureties the plaintiff bound the defendant personally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the first Roman that went under special bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick answer. Thus being enlarged out of the common Hall and dismissed, the next night following, unawares to the Consul, he departed to the Tucans into exile. When the day of this judgement was come, and that it was alledged for his excuse, That he was out of the town, and gone into banishment: yet nevertheless B Virginias affembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, dismissed the Court and licensed every man to depart, But the foresaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, fo that he was driven to tell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a person confined, on the other fide of Tyber, in a poor blind cottage out of the way. This process of judgement, and the preferring of the law abovesaid together, bufied the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like Conquerers, seeing the Nobles appalled at the banishment of Caso, supposed now their law was in manner fully established and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had dispossessed themselves, as it were, of the Common-weal, and medled not for their own parts with the State: the younger fort, and such especially as were of Cafe his crue and ac-Quaintance, were kindled the more against the Commons, and abated not their courage: marry, this good thereby was done upon them, that in some measure they tempered and ruled their turious affections and violent outrage. The first time after the exile of Cafe, that the law began again to be proposed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed also with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, fet upon the Tribunes; taking the occasion when they charged them to depart out of the hall, in such manner, that no one of them above his fellows was fingular, or carried home with him any special praise or blame more then another: but the Commons complained that for one Cafe, there were now flart up a thousand. All the days between, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable then they themselves. Courteously they would salute and speak unto the Commons, at all other times D they would invite them home to their houses and make them good cheer, assist them and be prefent with them in the common Hall, fuffer the Tribunes themselves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their courts and hold their affemblies whatfoever: shewing themselves at no time to any of them either publickly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwise the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not only in other causes made the Tribunes good dispatch, and went quietly through all their businesses but also the same men were chosen again for the next year following without any foul and cross word: fo far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by foft handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were cometo hand. And so by these fine fetches and devices, for one whole year the law was shifted off, and

E prettily avoided. The City being now in more quiet state, C. Claudius the son of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Consuls. And no news this new year: for the same care still, either about preferring or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the puny Nobles infinuated themselves more into the favour and familiarity of the Commons: so much more eagerly again on the other fide, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and flanders, to bring them into suspicion and jealousie with the Commons; Saying, that there was a conspiracy intended and contrived : that Cafe was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribuns, and to massacre the Commons: that they were set on work by some great ones, even the Ancients of the Nobles, utterly to abolish the Tribunes anthority out of the C. W. and to bring and reduce the City to the same pass again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the F Mount Sacer. Besides all this, war was seared from the Volscians and Æquians (10 ordinary it was and to duly once every year it came about: I yea and with all another mischief newly sprung, and unlooked for.

A rabble of banished persons, Outlaws and Bondslaves, to the number of 4500 having to their The Capitol Captain one Ap, Herdonius a Sabin, surprised in the night the Capitoll and Castle, and were ma- surprised fters thereof. Who immediately killed in the castle as many as would not be of their conspiracie & Slaves and Outlaws. take armes with them. The rest, amid this hurliburly ran headlong down into the Market place for fear. The al'army was given on all hands: and no cry heard but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in town. The Confuls were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubted also to let them be unarmed, not knowing what fudden occurrent this should be, that thus had entred and posses-G fed the city: whether it were forraign or domestical, arising from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and fallhood of their fervants; Yet they devised to appeare the uproar: and as they were buffe to repress it, the more other-while they stirred up new: for the frighted and amased multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they resolved to suffer them to take arms, and not all in general, but only (for that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a sufficient and trusty guard about them, ready at all assayes and dangers whatfoever. In this careful suspence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet H and convenient places of the City. But the day light difclosed the war and the Captain thereof. Appine Herdovine from our of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: " taking upon him forfooth to defend the cause of most miserable caitifs: " namely, to reflore home again unto their native country all fuch exiled persons, as had been minery, to retroit flours again that away the heavy yoke of flavery and bondage. Which wrongfully expelled, and allo to take away the heavy yoke of flavery and bondage. Which thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping "hand of the people of Rome But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would asfay the Volf ians and Æquians, yea, and procure what means he could, by all hard couries and "extremities whatfoever. Now the Nobles and Coff, began to fee more into the matter: and I besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threatned, they seared some practice from the Veientians or the Sabins: and left, there being already to many enemies in the City, the legionsaid Tuscans should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, left their old enemies and perpetual, the Volscians and Æquians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in fome part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and fundry were their sears. But of all other the dread and jealoufy of their own bondflaves prefented unto them most imminent and prefent danger: for fear, left every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust fecurely, nor yet missusts without some jeopardy: searing lest being once discredired, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such freights they R were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to frop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to enlue; exceeded those that presently appeared and were in fight, that no man seared either Tribuns and Commons. That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising alwayes by occasion of rest from all other, seemed then by reason of a forrein terror, stilled clean and brought asleep, And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their flate, which now began already to shrink and reel. For so surroully and madly were the Tribuns bent, that they fliffy would fland to it, and bear men in hand, That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seised on the Capitol; for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their I. Law: and that a fort of clients, followers, and favorits of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the stir they had made, took no effect, would flip away foon and be gone, in more flence I wis, than they thirher came, Whereuponthey called the people away from their armor and weapons, and fummoned them to an affembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Cost held a Councel fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribuns, than the enemies had wrought in the night featon. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters wherethey were fet inguard, then P. Val. leaving his collegue to keep the Senat together, departed halfily out of the Court & went straight The Oration ot P. Valerius into the Temple to the Tribuns, "What work is here my Masters (quoth he) youthat are Tribuns? M to the people. "Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Ap, Herdonius? and who was " notable to follicit and do any thing with your bondflaves and fervants, was his hap fo good as to "corrupt and inveigle your felves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whiles the enemy " is over our heads, to have our armor laid afide, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to "the whole multitude: If ye take no regard nor care (O Quivites) of the City, if ye pals not for your "selves yet have some reverence, and stand in sear of the Gods of your native countrey, which by "your enemies are now taken Priloners and captivate: Iup, Opt, Max, that most bountiful and Al-"mighty God, Queen June and Minerva, with all the rest of Gods, Goddesses (and heavenly "wights) are besieged: Outlaws and bondslaves are encamped about your Tutelar Gods, and " have in possession the Protectors and Patrons of your City. Is this, think ye, the form of a wife N "and well governed City? is it in good case indeed and as it ought to be? So many enemies not "only within the walls, but also aloft upon the cliff within the Castle, overlooking and comman-"ding both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people affemble in the Hall, Senators fit in "Court like as when we enjoyed peace and wereat reft: the Senator he delivereth his opinion at "the Councel boord: the citizens of Rome besides, are busy in their scrutinies and giving their "voyces, And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonalty, Con-" fuls and Tribuns. God and Man, all armed together, should set to their helping hand, should " run up into the Capitol to deliver, save, and set in quiet that most stately and sacred house of fap. "Opt. Max.: O Father Romalut, vouchfafe, I beseech thee, that mind and that courage unto thy " fucceffors and posterity, whereby sometime thou didst recover and win again this sortress from O "these same Sabins, betrayed and lost by corruption, and for a sum of gold: command them to en-"ter even that way, which thou first ledst, and thy valorous army followed after. Lo, I the Con-" inl, so far forth as a mortal man possibly may, will follow thee an immortal God, and thy soot-"fleps. The conclusion of his speech was this, That as he put himself in arms, so all the Romans shall do the like, And in case any man went about to hinder this he would without regard of Conuls rule and dignity, or Tribuns authority & might, país for no facred or inviolable laws: but what

A or where coever he were, in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly, Let the Tribuns (for a funch as they forbad to take arms again (Ap. Hirdonius) command hardly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Consul: It should be well seen that he would dare and do that by the Tribuns, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Conful go up into the Capitol. The night at length stayed these brauls begun, and husht all. The Tribuns tearing the armed forces of the Confuls, yeelded to the darkness of the night, and gave over. Now B when the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themselves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time, admonishing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. " For almuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Com-"mons: but both Senators and Commoners, the Cattle and throngest hold of the City, the Tem-"ples of the Gods their houses both publick and private, were ready to be yeelded unto the enea mies. Whiles these things were a practiting in the common place, for to appeale the diffention: the Confuls for fear, left the Sabins or the Veientians, enemies both, should stir and rife, were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tusculum of the C taking of the Cafile, the insprising of the Capitol, and likewise of the troublesome State wherein the City flood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Distator of Tusculum; he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the Messengers of the foretaid news, and thought it very expedient and "needful not to wait until there came Embafladors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the " present peril it self alone, the urgent necessity, their social Gods, and the faithful bond of league, "required no less at their hands, than to lend succour: adding moreover, that the Gods would " never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans; to bind and "obige unto them by a found benefit and pleasured one, so mighty a City, and so neer a neigh-bour. Whereuponit was decreed, to reicue them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands: who advancing toward D Rome by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Æquians or Volstians. But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very fame time Pub. Valerius having left his follow Conful to guard and fortify the gates, was fetting his men in array. The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promifed and affured them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City fet in quiet, if they would fuffer him to be informed what fraudulent and secret mischief was underhand practised by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his anceftors, and of his furname (which in re- * Poplicola, gard of the affectionate love unto the people, by a special care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and affemblies of E the Commons, nor crofs and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, gain-fay the Tribuns what they could (for all would not ferve) advanced forward, and marched up against the rising of the Capitol Hill. The Tusculan Legion stuck close unto them, and followed after, Citizens and Affociats both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men. Then began the enemies to fear, and wift not well what to trust unto, but only the scituation of the place. The Romans and their allies feeing their fear, came forward and advanced their Standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the Temple. Where P. Valerin the P. Valerius fighting manfully among the formost in the vanguard, was slain. P. Volumnius a Con- Consul slain. Finlar man, faw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and steps him-felf into the Consuls room, and fought in his stead. The souldiers for heat and eagerness of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this io great milchance, but got the victory, ere they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there flain, and Herdonius polluted the Temple with their bloud; Many taken alive Prisoners, and Herdmine himself was complices deflain outright. So the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or feated. free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tulculans had thanks given them. The Capitol was cleanled, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, cast * Quadrants or mites into the Consul his house, that he might with greater pomp of * Quadrars, a funerals be brought to the ground. When all was appealed and in quiet, the Tribuns were earnest with the Nobles to perform coin, the fourth the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with Claudius, to assoil the soul, and keep it part of As, and substituting of a new Conful. And in the month December, after much suit, and labouring of the Nobles, was L. Quintius Cincinnaius, the father of Caso, created Consul, and presently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and strucken dead, now that from blame of his fellow Conful late deceased: and to permit the law to be set on foot, and go cue and c. forward. The Conful flarly denied to suffer them to meddle with the law. before he had substituted a sellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the grand Election for the

A purpose, but rather attempered and framed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribinnes therefore, feeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about setting forward the army; and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and confectate there, wherein the Confuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatloever at Rome had passed under a law, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawfull assembly and generall Seffion, be abrogated & made void by the inffrages of the fouldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Consuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no ther should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Confuls. These matters scared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the reft that diquieted their hearts was this, that Quintim oftentimes had given out and faid, that he would not call an affembly of the people for the election of Coff. for that the city was grown fo far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and quall remedies: but that the Common wealth had more need of a Dictator that who loever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorthip, that checked all appeales. The Senat was affembled at that time in the Capitoll; thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried

Cout and belought one while the Confuls of their favour, another while the LL of the Senat of

Who being once entred into his office, in all his publick speeches and orations, continually ceased not as well to bridle, reftrain and keep in the Commonalty, as alio to chastife sharply the Senate; through the remissels of which degree, want of courage, it was come to pais, that the Tribuns became now to continue fill in office, and not as in the Common-wealth of the people of Rome, but as in some unruly and ditordered honie, with their lavish tongue raigned as it were, and ruled the rost: laying, " That to-"gether with his fon Cafo all vertue and constancy, all commendable qualities that graced young I "Gentlemen both in war and peace, were chased and utterly banished out of the City of Rome. In truth, if ye prefer it again, then I must needs say the Common-"weal is ill bestead, and had a shrewd turn that day whereon I was created Consul, yea, and worse " a good dealthan at what time P. Valerius the Conful was flain. But now first and formost "(quoth he) O Quirites, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immedi-" ately against the Volscians and the Equians how the Divine Providence of God hath appoint-"ed it, I know not, but surely we find the Gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars "ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had flood of those nations, in case "they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and possession of outlaws, better it is to guess N " by that which is past, than to try indeed by present experience. The Consul his Oration moved " and galled the Commons. The Nobles took heart, and were in a good belief, that the world was " well mended, and the state better reformed. The other Cos. more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal first in so weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himself the charge to perform the part and office of a Coniul, in the execution and accomplishment of those designments. But then the Tribuns made a game therat, and letting light at the Conful his words, inferred again and demanded, how the Confuls would lead out an army, and no man fuffer them to muster fouldiers. Marry (quoth Quintins) we need no mustering at all for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitol, they were all sworn unto him, and took their oath in this form, To affem- O ble together at the Conful his commandement, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to present your selves to * Lage de Praf- morrow, with your armour, at the lake of * Regillus without fail. Then the Tribuns began to cavil fo de de s. S.s. and wrangle and would needs have the people discharged in their conscience of that oath: alledge ing how when they took that military Sacrament, Quintius was but a privat person. There was not as yet, that neglect & contempt of the Gods entred into the world, which now reigneth every where and is so rise: neither did men interpret their oaths, and construe laws, to serve their own their protection; but could not once remove the Conful from his opinion (fuch a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithfull promife, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Confill propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted thefe orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law : nor the Consuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from thence forth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publick, that Magistrats should continue ftill in place from year to year, and that the fame perfons should be more then once chosen Tribunes. The Confuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, fay and gainfay what the Confuls would, the fame Tribunes were chosen anew : and the Nobles also D because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needs choose L. Quintims likewise for their Conful again. But all the year through was not the Conful more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatfoever then in this. Should I marvell my Lords of the Councell (quoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonalty, and your authority is so little The oration of worth among? Why, you, even your own felves fet light thereby: feeing, for footh, the Commons Cincinnatus abrake the ordinance of the Senat, touching the continuitie of Magiltrates, yea alfo, because ye would gatinft the Se-"not feem to yeeld one inch in rash nesse and folly to the multitude, are as ready and willing to nat "infringe the same: as who would say, this were to have more rule and authority in a city, namely, "to ale more levitie, inconstancie, and licentiousnesse. For it is a point of much more lightness "and vanity, I assure you, for men to disanull the acts and decrees of their own making, then of E "others. and L. Cornelius Maluginensis. In this year was held a ceffing and numbring of the citizens, but touching the Lustrum, there was some scrupte of conscience, because the Capitol had been taken, and the Consul flain. When Q. F. bius and Lucius Cornelius were thus Contals, suddenly in the very beginning of their year began great troubles for the Tribunes on the one fide, as their guile was, fet the Commons awork; the Latines and Hernicks on the other fide, fent word of great wars from the Volscians & Æquians . That the Vollcian legions were already at Antism, and the Colonie it felf greatly infpected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made G aforehand to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Confuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs, Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Antium: and Cornelius, to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear lest some part of their enemies, as the Equians man-

" to long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor fuffer my felfe to be declared Col. against " an express act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your felf would e' restrain the people of Rome of this their licentionsness, that thus they have not their defire, and

" also that you would perswade your self thus much of me, that so far off will I be from thinking " my honour by you impaired, that rather I will take my glory to be increased by the despising and

" refuling of a dignitie, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the continuation thereof Whereupon both the Confuls jointly together made an edict and proclamanot allow of his election. So there were created Confuls. Q. Fabins Vibulanus the third time, Ftion, that no man should by his voice Inominate Quintins, Conful: and If any man did, they would

ner was, should in running camp make rodes and forge the territories about. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine founders, so as the whole army should confill of it. parts of confederats and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Alies were come, the Conful pitched down his tents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall multer and purged his armie, he marched towards Antam and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies, where H the Volicians seeing no sorces yet come unto them from the Æquians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and sate, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battailons severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & ranged them along all about the counterfearpe and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the fignall , that the Allies alio flouid both begin battell and alio retire, when he founded the retreat. In like fort he placed the horimen behind the Principia at the back of each battel. Thus in three fundry parts he affailed the camp, and invironed it round about, and charging luftily hard upon them on every fide, I he beat the Vollcians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearfull multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retired to a fide and corner of the camp. The horimen might not eafily get over the trench, and (tood ftill of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark them when they should flie a but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chased them as they ran away on heaps : and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deferved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampires, as they fled ; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they shrowded themselves as they sled in the woods, they had perished every man, During these exploits about Antium, the Equians having sent before them the tallest and lustriest K. young men they had, Impriled the calle of Tufenlum, upon a fudden and at unawares in the night featon; and with the reft of their power they were encamped not far from the wals of Tufculum, intending to intercept and flay the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Anium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desertof the Tulculans, and the like jeopardy feeming to challenge and redemand femblable aid and faccour. Fabrus setting all other things aside, caused the booty in all hast to be conveyed out of the camp to Anium: where having left an indifferent guard, he hastnesh apace in order of battel to Tusculum; by reason whereof, the souldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such taked or boyled meats as were at hand ready. The Conful (Cornelius) sent a con- L voy of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tufoulum. The Contail (Fabins) with one part of his holf affailed the camp of the Æquians : for the other part he had let the Tuiculans have, to win again their fortreffe. Against all torce it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tulculans dilarmed and compelled to passenaked under the *yoke. Who sa they fied homeward with fiame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Conful in Algraum, and put to the tword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the reft of gallows made his army at Column, for to the place is named. The other Conful like wife teeing that there was with two jave. no danger threatning the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfitted & repulsed, departed endlong in the himself from the citie. So the Contuls entring two wates the borders of their enemies, made tharp war and spoiled the Volscians of the one fide, and the Aquians on the other. I find in molt M mind fathred writers that the Anguage in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Conful managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers. I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth. This war was no sooner brought to an end, but the domesticall Tribunes war at homeput the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheleste, fince they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through withit and see an end. Howbeit P. Lucretins, president of the city for the time prevailed thus much with them, That all Tribunitian actions should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Confuls. There was besides *Treasurers of a new occasion arole of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quantus Servilius * Questors, gave N Generall Re. tummons to M. Volscim to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without ceivers of the all doubt, had born falle witnesse against Cafe. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Volferm his brother, from the first time that he fell fick and took his bed, was at any time feen openly in the fireets, or lo much as to have fit up, and mended any whit, but of that difease which held him many months, he languished and confirmed away to death. nor about that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Cafo once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any pasport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privatly challengneence to depart. And to make this golden and to be tried by any indifferent and competent of Volfeires, and offered to traverie the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durft not abide the triall and to be judged, all these things put together and to contonant one to the other made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Follows then of Cajo, which was grounded upon the bare tellimony of Volferms. The Tribunes were only the flay; who faid plainly they would not suffer the Questors to hold any sessions or judicials court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a folemn affembly about their law. So were both their

A matters put off unto the Confuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie, & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were clean danted and ftriken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) afpiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law; and referved themselves wholly to argue and reafon at the affembly for the Election of new Magistrats. And albeit the Confuls had bent all their might and main against the continuity of the Tribunship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majelty, yet got the Tribunes the mastrie, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon request and petition, auto the Equians, And the Seffing, which the year before began, was now finished. B And this was counted the tenth general Survey and foleum purging of the citie from the foundation on thereof. There were numbred in the Cenfe-book of citizens 132419 polles. Aglorious and honourable year it was untill the Confuls, both at home and in war. For they not onely procured peace acroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unitie, yet in leffe trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Nautius, that there were created Confuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one fort, as the Conwith M. Valerins, the fon of Valerins, and nephew of Volefus, was T. Quintins Capitolinus created Queltour, a man that had been thrice Conful. Foratmuch therefore, as Cafo, the worthielt gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be reflored again, neither to the house of the Quintif, nor the commonweal, he purtued of mere pietie, with just &c lawfull war, and falle wittness, who would not suffer on anythand the innocent person to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Verginius, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months respit given them to consider therof, and look into it throughly : to the end, that when they had advertised the people what secret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards fuffer them to proceed to a fcrunitie, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citie into fuls croffed the going forward of the law, fo the Tribunes hindred the judiciall proceeding against Volleim. But the new Questors were men of more power and greater authority. For together a good and quiet state.

But the Æquiads would not abide, that long it should continue so; Who having broken the league, D which the year before was made with the Romans, choie Gracehus Cluilius for their governor and generall, who was in those daies the greatest man among the Aquians. Under the conduct of this Graceins, they enter fielt in warlike manner the country of Lanuvism, and from thence into the territoric of Tufentum, spoiling and rantacking as they went : and being loaden with preyes and pooties, they pitch their tents in * Algidam. Thither repaired from Rome into their * Roequa del Camp, Q. Fabins, P. Valerius, and A. Posthumius as embassadours, to complain of wounds received, Papa. and to demand amends and fatisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Aquians feemed to grant them audience, and willed them to declare what medage and commission they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oake; for that himself had some other matters to disparch the while. Now there grew a mightie great Oake hard by the General his pavilion, spreading

E his boughs even over it, and the shadow thereofferved for a cold sitting place. Then one of the Embaffadors, as he went his way, " Let both the facred Oake (quoth he) and what divine power foever is feated in this place, heare and know that by you first the league is broken, who now regard our present complaints, and shortly affilt our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute " and revenge at once the diffoiall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So foon as the Embaffadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Confuls should lead forth an armie against Gracehus, into Algidum, and the other have in commission, to wast the borders of the Agnians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindred the muster and peradventure had staied it altogether, but for a new fearfull occurrent that suddainly came in the neck of the other. For a mightre power of Sabines were approached well neer to the wals of the citie, robbing, ipoiling and destroying all a fore them with sword and fire, The territorie was pitiously round about

F laid desolat, and the citie therewith fore terrified. Then the Commons stomacks came down, and gently they tooke weapons in hand: and (lay what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Nantins had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Eretum, with rodes and incursions, and those for the most part by night, made such foul work and wast in The Sabines country, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched. Minntim in his exploits, had neither like good successe, nor yet equal courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemie, and received no great foile and loffe at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himselfe for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the co-wardite of one inceaseth the courses of another) and affailed the camp in the night season: but

G freing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raifed mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires stopped up all passages, five horsemen being even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Conful with his armie was befreged. Nothing could there have hapned fo little thought of, and unlooked for : whereupon there was such tear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the camp, but the very citie, Nautius the Conful they send for, and becaule they thought him like to doe but imaligood, they agreed therfore to creat a Dictator, who might reflore again the dift-eifed state of the C. W. And L. Quintins Cincinnatus by content of all H men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of tiches despite all things elie, and suppose there can be no great honour and vertue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excesse. This L. Quintins, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to fet upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a peece of ground, to the quantity of with his own fource acres, called at this day Quintia prata, t, Quintins his meddows, on the other fide of Tyber, over agrinli that very place, where now the Arienal and Shipdocks are, and there was he found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but buffe and earnest about some rusticall work, no doubt he was : and after salutations passed on both fides, between him and the Embassadours that were sent, he was, requested by them, that I he would put on his best gr wn, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonweal) hear a meffage from the Senat First, he marvelled what the matter should be & very often asking of them if all were welche willeth his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe Arsicway, out of his forie cottage: which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his (west, and made himfelf tomewhat mannerly) and then came forthunto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, stilled him by the name of Dictator : calling hard upon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtfull termes the armie stood. Then was there barge provided ready for Quintins, at the cities coft : and being ferried over the river, his three ions met him and received him first, then others of his kinstolk and friends, and after them the more part of the Senatours. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the & Sergeants going before, was he brought to his houle. Great concourfe there was also of the Commons : but nothing to joyous were they, to see Quim: 11, supposing that government of his overgreat and absolute, and bi-otelf a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily, nothing was done, but a good flanding watch kept in the city. The morrow after, the Dictator being come into the common place of affembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the horie, L. Tarquitus, of Noble blond descended : a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a bravelervitour, and an excellent fouldier. Then Quintius with the Generall of horiemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawsteed : commandeth ail shop windows though the city to be thut, and chargech that no man should follow any privat bufinesse of his own. Then as ma- L ny as were of age to fight, were willed to shew them elves in their atmour, before the san set, in Mars field, every one with victuals dreffed for five daies, and with twelve forked takes a peece for to topitch in the rampart. And that wholoever were above that age, and were unweldy, and not meet for fervice should dresse and provide victuals for the next souldier unto him, whiles he himself made ready his armour, and sought for stakes aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furni'b themfelves with stakes, and took whatfoever they could find, and whatfoever was next hand a no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Malter of the norte likewife with his men of arms, in such good order and aray, as might not only terve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M both reginems they spared not to encourage and exhort their fouldiers, according as the present time required : willing them to fet foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by " night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (lay they) before there was great need; for "that the Romen Comuland army were befieged, and had now three daies already been pent "up fast included an a what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew : for ofcentimes in the twinciking of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, here fall out accidents of right "great moment and importance. On afore apace, Enfigne crieth one : follow fouldier faithanother. Thus went they also luftily forward, and all to pleasure and gratific their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum : and fo foon as they perceived their enemies to be neer at hand, they pirched down their enfignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth N as he could fee in the dark, and having viewed well the fination, coasting and fashion of the camp, commanded the Marshals and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should be taid up together in one place, and that the fouldiers with their armour and stakes only, should conseagain into their ranks. What he commanded was foundone. Then in the fame order that he marched, he draweth out his hoft in length, and compafieth the camp of his enewies, and commandeth them all upon a fignall or watchword given) to fet up a fbout, and prefently upon the thout to calt a trench, & every man fluck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, ftraightwayes the fignall followed. The fouldiers do that which they were hidden : the shout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Contul his camp : cauting in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoycing one O with another to hear the shour of their fellow-citizens and countriemed, with a conceit of their coming to reicue, begin of themielves from their fentinels and Corps de guard, to threaten and territie their enemies. The Confultet them forward and faid, there was now no ftaying for the matter, nor delaies to be made : for that it appeared by that alarm, that nor only their friends were come with fuccours, but also had begun to skirmith: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp, was alreadly on the ontward fide affaulted. Whereupon, he commandeth his fouldiers to arm, and to rollow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmifh,

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outery and shouting made signification that the enemies on that fide also were driven to their shifts and in great barzard. By this time the Æquians had addreffed themselves to impeach them in their trenching and making of their rampire, to the end that they might not be compaffed about : but the al'arme was given and the ikirmish already begun by their enemies within a fearing therefore, left they would break through the midft of their camp, they turned from the pioners and workmen without, to them that fought within, and therby gave the other leave to plie their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure : and to they maintained skirmifh with the Cof. untill day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every fide by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out batell with one of the ar-B mies, Then the both of Cumius, which prefently upon the finithing of the trench returned to their wespons, entring of the mures and rampires of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again, and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then seeing themselves thus distressed and so hardly driven on every fide, left fighting and fell to intreating; they belought the Cof. on one fide and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effution of bloud and crutel maffacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Conful he posted them off to the Dictator who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be contented without their Thame and ignominy besides. But commanded that Clusters their generall with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoyeed them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio: as for the Æquians bloud, he fought notfor it, he had no need thereof: they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now at length, mangretheir heads, contested, that the nation was vanquished and subdued ; his will and pleasure was, they should passe all under the yoke or gallows: the maner wherof is this. They took three tprars or javelins, and fer two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthwart laftned unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Aquians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of flore (for naked be tent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he bettowed upon his own fouldiers only : and rebuking sharply the Confuls army and the Co. himself, Ye shall (quoth he) souldiers go without your part of booty wonof the enemie, whole booty ye had like your selves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Mi-"nutins, until thou begin to have the heart and courage beforming a Conful, thou shalt be a Lieute-" nant only over their legions. So Minutius being discharged of the Consulfhip, remained still D as he was commanded, with the army. But fo well were men content in thole daies, willingly to yeeld obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather then of a difgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictatour a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being affembled together by Q. Fabins Provost of the citie, detheir parton. At some the occasioning aniemoned together by φ_{L} abins provoit or the citie, deserting creed that $Q_{uintsus}$ should enter the city in triumph with his army matching in battell aray as the $L_{L}Q_{uintsus}$ came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies : the enfignes are carried a- triumpheth. fore , then followed the army laden with spoil and pillage. Great chear and banquets were let out, men fay, upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with longs of triumph, with sports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn Bongs or thumps, with notes and the Tufchlan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, feath. The fame day L. Mamilias the Tufchlan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchifed citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictat. have refigued up his office, but that the Court, held for the triall of M. Volfeise, endited of bearing falle witnesse, stated hims and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindred the judiciall proceeding against him, if they had not flood in awe of the Dictatour. But Volfeins was convicted and had sentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintins having taken the Dictatorship for fix months, gave it over the fixteenth day after be entred into it. About the same time the Conful Nantins fought valiantly with the Sabines at Eretum : who besides the walting of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabines was fent into Algidum, to succeed in the roome of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribuns began to ftir, about their law : but because the two armies were absent, the Senatour prevailed so F much at that time, that no bils were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewife obtained, that they might create the felf-same Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were feen in the Capitol, wolves chafed away by hounds: for which strange fight, the Capitol was purged. And these were the acts of that year. Then followed Confuls Q. Minutins & M. Horatins Pulvilling. In the beginning of which year, whiles all was quiet abroad, the fame Tribunes and the fame law caused differeign and ledition at home: which would have grown to a farther milchief, in fuch hears men were, had not word been brought, as it were of let purpole, that the garifon at Corbio was surprized in the night by the Æquians and put to the sword whereupon the Confuls G called the Senat together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitary army and with a tunning camp invade Algidum. Then was the strife about the law laid aside clean, and a new contention arole about the mufters. But the Confuls with all their authority, were overfwaied of the Commons, by the help and affiltance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear-for intelligence came, that a power of Sabins were come down already into the territories of Rome for to teter booties and make spoil : and from thence advanced against the city. Upon which fear, The Tribunes were content that fouldiers fhould be preft, yet not without this covenant indenteds That for as much as they had now themselves these five years been trifled off was fair and goodly to fee to, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licention freste. The and deluded, & that this protectorship of theirs stood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their H fmall number, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten created Tribanes of the Commonatty. The Nobles were to near driven and to fuch straights, that will they, nill they, yeeld they must thereto : with this provilo, that they (hould never after Elect the fame men Tribunes twife. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past, turn to nothing, like as others had done before, Ten Tribunes they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36, year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created sout of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The musters then being taken and fouldiers garolled, Minneius went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatins because the Equians after they had put the garison at Corbio to the I fword, and won Hortana besides, fought with them in Algianm. Many a manthere he slew and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but allo out of Corbio and Horsana. As for Corbio he utterly rafed it, for betraying the garifon there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp.Virginius made Confuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great fearcity there was of corn. by reason of the untemperat and unseasonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Avenine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again; who. all the year following, when T. Romulius and C. Veturius were Confuls, in all their Halls and afse femblies, ftill published the law : faying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increased et to no purpole, in case their affairs should he dead in their two years, as they had done in the whole 5, years past. Whiles they were earnestly debating these things, fearfull messengers came K in all halt from Tufculum, with news, that the Equians were in the territory of Tufculum. The fresh desert of that nation would not suffer the Romans for shame to defer their helping hand. Wherenpon both Confuls were fent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algedam in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountred and struck a battell : in which were flain about 7000. enemies. The rell were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Confuls fold out-right, by reason of the want of mony in their common treasury. But this caused the souldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end ministred matter to the Tribunes, to accuse the Consuls unto the Commons. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpens and A. Eternisa were Confuls: Romalina was arrested and put in fuit by C. Clandius Cice. re, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturent was likewife troubled by L. Halienus an Edile or L Warden of the Commons, Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Remulius was finedin * 10000 Affes. Verurius in * 15000. But for all this hard 3 am 5/0. tion or the records a feet to those former Confuls, the new were never a for more remiffe and cool in the quarrel: faying, Well may we also be cast and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the neerer to compaffe and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only to oft, was waxen stale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senatours, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the * laws of the Commons fo difliked and displeased them, they requelted them to suffer certain Lawmakers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might et device acts commodious & profitable to both parts and or the equal liberty and freedom of all. As M 6. for the jubliance it felt of this motion, the Senators refuled not : but they flatly faid, that none but of the Nobility should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, &differed only and fqaured about the lawgiver, there were Embaffadors fent to Athens, Sp. Poftha-Embaliadours mins Airas, A. Manlins, and P. Sulpisius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplific and fest into Greece copy out the famous and worthic laws of Solon: to fearch out and learn the ordinances, cuftomes, and rites of other cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year following more quiet, when P. Curiatim, and Sex. Quintiling were Confuls, by reason of the continual filence of the Tribunes : which, as the expectation of the Embafiadors that were gone to Aibens. and of ftrange and torain laws, first and principally procured a so, two mighty great calamities that role both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noisome and loathsome both to man and N healt, afterwards continued, By means wherof, the fields lay walt and defolate, the city dispeopled with continual burials : many right worshipful and honourable houses thereby mourned. Sergine Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinu dyed therof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went ofic like wile : in whose toom the Augurs (his Associats) choice C. Veturius: and the rather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quintilius the Conful departed also this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold losses and calamities fouly distained. But for enemies all was quiet, After this were C. Menenius, and P. Seftim Capitolinus made Confuls. In which year like wife there was no war abroad, maty at home fome troubles arofe. By this time were the Emballadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therfore the Tribunes were fo much the more earnest and urgent, that once at length they would fet on, to describe and put O down some laws. And agreed it was, that there should be created Decemvirs above all appeal : &. for the yeare ten g, there should no other Officers and Magistrats be in place. Now, whether any of these might be of the Commons or no, that was a question : and hereupon some debate and controversie continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles went away with it, & had the pre-heminence,upon this condition, that neither the law Icilia, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other facred lawes should be repealed. Thus in the 302 yeare after that Rome was built, was the form of the cities government changed the second time, and to the Confuls from the Decemviri.

was the foveraign rule translated, like as before, from the kings to the Confuls.

tes called Desused for the makingof that the great Leet-day grew neer for the Election, made men very delirous to create Decemvirs again the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Confuls, as well as of Kings, fought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes : feeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yeelded in their perogative, and admitted in some fort the appeal. G But after that the folemn affembly for the chaling of Decemvirs, was published against the * Trisundinam, or third market day next enfuing, to such an heighth was the ambition and defire of That is the a this digmy growne, that the very chiefe men, and principall heads of the City (for feare, I be- day foll leeve, left the policilions of to great a government, in cale they were not invelted themselves in the place; should be open unto some unmeet and unworthy persons J went about and made court to every man, fuing in humble manner to those very Commons, with whom they had been at strife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. The worthinesse and reputation of men of those years, and having born and gone feemed to bring in those (hould the people accept, and none other; that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them and give their after they were propounded, as to propole and preferre them their own lelves. And when as they were thought lufficiently corrected.

according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were fet forth: then in the high court of Parlament, affembled of all the Centuries &

mone that infinit number of statuts, heaped and hudled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice, both publick and privat. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finished and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now

F degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, afooner therefore it faded and tell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurifdiction of Confuls returned, and was conferred upon twain. The Decemvirs created were these: Ap.Clandius, T. Genarius, D. Sestius, L. Veturius, C. Islius, A. Maulius, P. Suspirius, P. Carinius, T. Romalius, Sp. Posthumsus, Clandius and Genusius, because they had been Consuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Sestius one of the Confuls the year before because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators against his fellow Confulswill. Next to their were counted the three Embaffadours that went to A-B thent, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embassage into fo far & remote a country, & also because men were perswaded, that by reason of their insight and skill in forrain ordinances of ftrange nations, they might be well emploied in fetting down, and making of new; The reft made up the number. They fay, that in the last scrutinies and suffrages at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther stept in years, to the end they might not to flercely and floutly gainfay and croffe the opinions and conflictations of the other. In this new state of government, Appins was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the roft and swaied all the reft, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had so altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden, of a cruel and terrible presecutor of the Commons, he proved a very Publichla, and courter of the Commonalty, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one fat his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministred justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knitches of rods were born by the Lictors before the foveraign judg : as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one fer jeant to give attendance. In this agreement among themselves, (which accord other whiles when they were privat persons, had been hurtfull unto them) reflect only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one onely matter : for whereas they were created absolute, and past all appeal, it fortuned, that in the house of P. Seffinis, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke assembly of the people. The thing being no leffe apparent in view, then hainous and horrible in fact, C. Inline a Decemvir, brought Seftine in queltion therefore, put him in fuit to an-D (werst a certain day, and became plaintif anto the people, and accufed that defendant, whole competent judge he was by order of law. And to he yeelded of his own right adding to much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was found and uncorrupt, & fet asit were from Oracle, and Gods own mouth, & al men wiling to accept of jultice at their hands then fer they to it, and went about the making and giving of laws, And with great expectation of men, they fet out ten Tables, and called the people to a generall affembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go. & (that which might turn to the good to the benefit, and hap. The ten tables pines of the Commonweal, themselves their children &posterity) to read the law there published: E protefting, that fo far as ten men could with all their wifedome forefee & provide for, had devifed indifferent lawes, and equall for all forts of callings, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of manymen, were of deeper reach to fee fatther into things, they gave them good leave, to call in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yea, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was short and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article : and look what laws the confent of all men

through fach offices, being now come in question, and submitted to the choice and judgement of H others, pricked on Ap. Clandins, and let him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that stood to be Decemvirs again. For otherwhiles he was more like one that fued for an office, than him that prefently bare office : blaming preforages of best quality in the City, and laying based to their charge: but extolling the values & basel of the Competitors. Himself in perion forting among the Duilij and Icilij, and fach like as favoured the Tribunes, went (winging and fquaring in the common place, using them as infiruments to venditate himself forth to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who untill that time had been ingularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their cies upon him, and began to mark, & marvail much what his meaning was reasoning thus among themselves: I " Surely there is no foundnesse nor goodnesse herein, but all meer diffimulation and bypocrisie. "Certainly, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appear so much courtesse. 51 What? to force his own nature too much within compasse : to debate himself, and suffer priof yat men to be his fellows, was a figne of one, that made not fo much halt to forgo a dignity and er promotion, as lought means to keep it still. Openly they durft not presume to check and with-Rand his ambitious defire, but affaied by pleafing and foothing him up, to represe and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was, that he should not Elect his own self a thing, which unlesse it were the Tribunes again, and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with K all his heart accepting therof, made profession that he would be president of that honourable Court and Seffion, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the weal-publik. And to took the vantage of that opportunity, to let forward his own delign, which they meant should have ftopped and croffed the fame. And after he had by fecret packing and convaling with the other competitours, and given the repulie unto the two Quintis (Capitolinus, and Cincinnatus) and put befide the Cushion his own Uncle by the fathers side (C. Clandins, a most front & cefolut champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality : he createth Decemvirs. such as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own fweet felf with the first. Which as there was no man thought she ever would have done, so all good men milliked when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornelius Maluginungs, M. Sergins, L. Me- 1. untini, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Petilins, T. Antonius Merenda, Cafo Duillins, Sp. Oppins Cornicen. M. Rabaleins. And there's an end of Appins playing anothers mans part. Off went his mask and vilour now, and to from thence-forth, he began to shew himself in his own likenesse, and to live in his kind : yea, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entred into office. Day by day had they their fecret meetings by themfelves apart from all other a and being once hereby furnished with ungratious and proud designments, which they had closely complotted together, they could no longer hold & diffemble their pride. Few might have accesse unto them: feldom would they be spoken with, the wing themselves strange, surly, & churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the * Ides of May, which was the usual 15.day of May and folemn day then of entring into offices of government. In the very begining whereof they M made the first day of their magistracie noted by an intimation and evident shew of exceeding terrour. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors had observed this order, That one alone should have the rods of State born before him, and that this regall ornaments should passe round through them all in course one after another : Behold, these came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij, bundles of rods carried before him. So that thele Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, faltned within the rods, tookup and filled the whole Forum or common place as they went. And for as much as they were created absolutely, and their commission ran without all appeal, men made this exposition, that to go with their axes or without was all one, & made no matter at all. Thus was there a shew & representation of ten KK. And this terrour grew more and more, not with the meanest and basest fort only, but also with the chief and best of the N Patritians: supposing that they sought to pick a quarell, and minister occasion and overture to some maffacre : that if any man should offer either in the Senat or among the people, to speak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there should be exemplary whipping and heading, to the terrour of all other. For, besides that, from the people there was no remedy and succour to be had, by reason that the appeal unto them was quite disabulled and taken away : the Decemvirs themfelves drew fo all in one line together and were fo combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and croffe that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and fentences should be censured and corrected, by the appellations or appeal to one of their brethren in commission . yea, and in some cases put off some matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong O unto their own jurisdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent : but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the fmatt. The Nobles were forborn and escaped clear and scotfree; the meaner persons went to the wals, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right ctuelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never respected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should passe: and in open place they pronounced lentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, frem him not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known, That they had conspired together, not for the present time only to do wrong and injurie, but also were confederat between themselves privily, yea, and had bound it with an oath, to call no affembly at all for the electing of new magistrats : but being now once invested in the soveraign rule, to hold the possession of the Decemvirship for ever-The Commons than began to look about them, to behold and advise well the countenances of the Nobles, to see if they could from them catch some good gale of wind, some hope again of liberty, at whole hands they fearing bondage, had brought the common weal to this hard paffe. B The LL. of the Senat hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went, and yet were perswaded that the Commons were well enough served, and delerved no better: who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into fervitude and thraldome. Help they would not with the leaft of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them : that having a wearisome and tedious lothing of the pretent state, they might fall to a longing defire after two Confuls, and with the old world were come again. By this time now was the better part of the year gone and past : and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former year: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a Parliament to the former of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weal should need these ten. magnitrats: but expected it was certainly, that the affembly for Election of Confuls should out of hand be published and proclamed. Marry, there was one thing hammered in the Commons heads, by what means rhey might revive again the Tribunes authority; the very grand bulwark of their freedom, and the thing that now had discontined and lien dead. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Deceuvirs, who at the first presented usually unto the Commons fight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribunes, for to attend upon their persons (a thing right plaufible and pleafing unto the people :) were guarded now, with certain tall penfioners of their Nobility : whole troups of them flood about their Tribunal leats and places of judgment. These made havock and spoil of the Commons and their goods : and look what the mind of a mighty man stood unto and lusted after, it was his hap to have it whatsoever. Nay, there was no spare now made of their backs and fides : some were scourged with rods, some lost their heads D by the ax. And because this cruelty should not go unrewarded, lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well fleshed; not only opposed not themselves to withstand these wrongful dealings & hard courses, but carried it afore them, openly professing & avowing that they wilhed rather their own licentionineis, than the liberty of all. The * Ides of May * 15 day of were now come about, and no new magistrates elected in the others roome. Forth come the De- Mixcemvirs. (who to fay a truth and to give them their right, were no other than privat persons) nejther with minds abated for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal ensignes, to fee out and shew their honour & dignity. When the people faw that, they made no other reckoning but this was plain nurping of the kings government, and no better. And now farewell freedom E for ever and a day. For neither had they presently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it again. So that now, not they only let fall their hearts and were discouraged in themfelves, but also grewto be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour-nations: who dildained highly, that they should have soveraignty of rule, who were not free themselves, nor enjoyed their own liberty. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome : and when they had for aged far and neer, and driven away booties both of people and of cattell, without impeachment, they gather their army together again, that had hanged here and there up and down, and entred unto Eretum, where they encamp themselves : laying this for a ground, and building their hope upon their discord at Rome, that it would stay their mustering. Not only the news that came hereof, but the the flying of the country pealants, put the whole city in great fear. F The Decemvirs fall to confulting what were belt to do. And whiles they were to feek what courie to take, and between the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and delititie, there hapned also another fearfull trouble in the tail of the former. The Equians from another side were encamped in Algidum. And from Tufenlum Embassadours brought tidings that their country was wasted with excursions from thence, whereupon they craved their help and aid. These tearfull occurrents to troubled and perplexed the Decemvits, that confidering the city was now befer at once with wars from two places, their flomacks were come down to consult with the Senat. They commanded therefore the Senatours to be lummoned to the Curia. And well they wift, what a great fit and ftorm of anger, displeasure and blame was towards : namely that they would burden them & lay to their charge, how they were the only cause both of the country wasted already, and G of the perils like prefently to enfue: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt and shrewd push, to abolish utterly their government, unlesse they stuck closely together to it, and by extending their authority sharply upon some few of the stoutest, quail and crush the the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bedell was heard in the Foram or common place, citing the Senatours to repaire into the Councell house to the Decemvirs: thenovelty and thrangeneffc of the matter, (because they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Councell) canfed the Commons to marvail and mufe what was befallen, that they should after fuch discontinuance, take up a thing to oblolete and out orule. And thus they conceived of it,

A Decemvir, began to speak, rather by of way praier and intreatie, then in checking and reproving wife, and belought Appins for his brothers soul sake, who was his own father, to remember "and regard more that civil focietie wherein he was born, then this ungracious and wicked con-

"federacie, contracted with his fellow Decemvirs. And this request I make (quoth he) tender-

"ing your privat estate more then the Commonweal. As for her, if she might not by fair meanes

"and with their good wils, obtain her own due and right, the would by foul waies, and in fpight that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thank war for this, that any ancient H guife and cultom of a free city was come up and in uce again. They looked about on every fide of the Forum to ice if they might cipy a Senator, but few or none could they hear of, any where. Then looked they into the Curia, and behold, none at all apeared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own felves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwife, but that in the conceipt, & conient of all men, their government was become odious : & the Commons also thus colle Ged and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to allemble a S. nat. And now laid they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if so be the Commons would join with the Senat : and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsel, so the Commons likewise would refuse to be multered. In this wife muttered and whifpered the Commons. And in truth carcely was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city : for very griefe and indignity to fee that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands : and forgetting the state of the common-weal, they became careful of their own privat affairs: thinking themselves so far forth freed from oppression and wrong, as they were remore and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with so Lordly & imperious rulers. When they would not affemble at their fummons, the officers were fent unto their houses, both for to freine and take away freffes for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refuled to come at their commandment, or of fet purpose or no. And word they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better apaid to hear K that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They they gave commandment that they should be sent for a and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they affembled more in number then they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and sold and utterly betraied by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yeelded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given lawfull summons, who being privat men had no power at all so to do. But they shewed more obeifance and submission, as we have heard say, in coming to the Councel house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs. Firft, L. Valerim Potitus, as it recorded, after that Appine Clandine had proposed unto them the L. cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common weal. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea, and forbad him with threats, upon pain of their high dipleasure, he inferred again and menaced, that he would go forth unto the commons, and fobegan a broil and tumult, M. Horatius Barbains like wife took part with him, and was nothing behind in foutneffe to main-M.Oraim Bar tain the quarell, terming them ten Tarquins : "and are ye aware (quoth be) how the Kings were in times palt expelled by the the Valerii and Horatii? And yet the name it was not of "Kings, that men were to weary of and loathed in those daies. For why? it was right lawful to call " Jupiter by that name : whereby Romulus also the founder of this City, and other Princes his ss successours have been called: yea, and the name bath been used and is retained still as a solemn tietle, in the facred rites of holy Kirk, Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the King, that then M " was odious, and nothing els, which enormities, it they were in those daies in the King himself, a " lawfull prince, or in the King his fon intollerable, who can abide and endure the fame in fo ma-"ny privat persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debar men of their liberty of "speech in the Councel House, left ye drive them thereby to speak their mind and complain with-"out the Councel House. Neither see I any reason at all, why it were not as lawfull for me " a privat man, to affemble the people to an audience, as for you to call the Senat together to a 6. Councel. Make triall when loeverye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our just griefe will be, in recovering our libertie again, than this greedy defire of yours, holding and upholding "fill your niurped, unla wfull, and tyrannicall rule. You have propounded here unto us, forlooth, er concerning the Sabines war : as who would tay, the people of Rome can be at greater war with N er any than with those, who having been created Magistrates only for the publishing and enacting of certain laws, have left now neither law nor justice at all within the city. Who have taken away " their Comices, i. Courts and Leets of Election, their yearly Magistrats, the successive change and course of bearing rule, the only thing that maketh Isonomy, and equality of freedome. Who 64 being but private men, are possessed both of regall ornaments, and also of roiall government. After the expulsion of the Kings, the Magistrats that succeeded were of the Nobility : in procefle of time, upon the rifing of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out of the Commonalty. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, of whether state or body are es ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the Common people? What have ye ever done with ad-"vice and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peers? who now for a whole yeers space O "almost, have held no Councell of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you restrain "them from speaking for the Weal-publick. Well presume not too much, neither bear your selves " upon the timoroulness of others. For, trust me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, "feem more irktom and unsupportable, than what soever els they can doubt and fear hereafter. As Horatius spake these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethink themselves of some in-C: Claudius different & mean courfe, either in anger to be revenged, or in lenity to pardon and partipal, nor wift to the Decemwhereto this matter might tend and proceed in the end : then C. Clandins, uncle to Appins, the

of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as of much debate and ftrife there enfine " commonly heats of anger and cankred rancour, I am in dread & horror what the lequel and if-" fue will be of these jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the rest to speak, but only to the point proposed and occasion of their meeting, yet they were abashed to interrupt B the speech of Claudius and to cut him off: but suffered him to goe on untill he made an end. And in conclution his opinion and fentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any act of the Senat should for that time passe in that behalf. And all that were present took his words to. as it Clanding deemed no otherwite of the Decemvirs, then of private men. Many of them also, such especially as had been Consuls, were of his mind, and faid as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharp in out ward shew, but far lesse forcible and effectuall in deed; advising and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go togethers and chuse an Interregent. For this man feemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates; (bad though they were) that had called Ca Senat, and held them in Councell: whereas the former, that would not abid, any act to paffe, I. Comelius bis reckoned them but for privat persons. Thus when the Decemvirs cause began to thrinke and go Speech in the downward, L. Cornelius Maluginenfis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being reserved of pur- Scat. pote to give his opinion in the last place of al the Confular Senatours, such as had been Confuls, pretending a care that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Collegues, faying, that "he marvelled much by what misfortune or destinie it hapned, that the decemvirs should be chal-"lenged and oppugned, especially by those that had stood for the Decemvirship, or by their of friends and affociates : and how it came about, that in fo many months space, whiles the city was " at relt and without fear of war, no man made queltion or doubt, whether they that were in place, "and governed the state, were lawfull Magistrates or no: and now at last, when the enemies are " in a manner at the gates, they should sow civil differtion, unlesse this were the meaning of it, D a that in a troubled flate it would not be so clearly seen and perceived, what they went about. But co no man is able (qd.he) to fet down a true doom, & alledge a ruled case in sogreat a matter as this ce is to men, whose minds are busied and wholly possessed of a greater care. And therefore my o-" pinion is that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with, "namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determied, and they out of office; " the Senat (hould discusse and debate, when as the wars now at hand were dispatched, and the "Commonweal brought once again to quietness. And that Appins Clanding should make this rec-" koning even now atorhand, and know that he is to render a reason of that high court of Parla-"ment, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himself: "namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue still, untill the other laws E " which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmd. As for the present time, he thought good that " all other matters should surcease, and be passed over, save the war only the rumour whereof, it "they thought to be falle, and that they were but tales that not only the meffengers, but also the "Embassadours of the Tusculans reported, then his advise was to send out espials, who upon their "discovery might bring more certain tidings. But in case they gave credence to messengers and 44 Embassadours both, then with all speed possible to muster, and the Decemvirs to have the con-"duct of the armics, and to lead them whither they thought meet : and that nothing els should be thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the punie Sentacurs by importunat convassing, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both role up the fecond time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them aloud, that they might be per-F mitted to speak concerning the Commonweal; and in cale they might not be suffered by reasonof the faction, to have the liberty of speech in the Councel House, they would speak their mind without, before the people. For neither could privat men (as they were) debar them in Senat Houle, nor in open affembly & to give place unto their imaginary, and pretended imperial enfigns, they would never be brought. Then Appine supposing the matter wel-neer come to this passe, that unlesse the violence were resisted with like boldnesse, their rule was at an end, and their authoritie conquered : Ye were not best (quoth he) to speak but to the matter, whereupon we sit in Consultation. And when Valerius replied again and said plainly, that he would not hold his tongue for a privat mans commandment : Appius fent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon Valerius cried for help to the Quirites, from the porch of the Councell House. Then L. Corneisus claiping G Appins about the middle, without regard to content him whole good he pretended, flaied the strife. So by the mediation of Cornelius, leave was granted to Valerius for to lay his mind at his own pleasure. But, for as much as his libertie proceeded no farther, then to some iew words, the Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles alto, such as had been Con-

fuls, and the ancients, upon an old cankred hatred that they beare still against the Tribuns authority, where upon they supposed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, then unto the government of the Confuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their own accord should themselves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon hatred and malice received against them, the Commons should take heart of grasse, and hold up head again. For if with gen. H tie handling of the matter, without fir and clamour of the people, the regiment retnined again unto the Confuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by meanes of wars coming between, or through the moderation of the Confuls in their government, the Commons might in time for-Thus whiles the Nobles were filent and made no more words, a multer was proclamed, and get the Tribuns quite. the younger fort of people, feeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeal, made aniwer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed betweenthem(elves who should go forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The chiefe & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appins Claudius. And for that there feemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs supposed the violent nature of Appius, finer to represse all troubles and mutinies in the citie; and considering withall the disposition of Fabius, to be lesse constant and resolute in goodnesse, then active and quick in militarie tervice. (for this man having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in war; the Decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had so greatly changed, that he chole rather to be like Appin then himfelf) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the war against the Sabines, together with M. Rabuleim and Q. Petilim joined in commission with him. M. Cornelius was fent into Algidum, with L. Minutius, T. Antonius, Cafo Duillius, and M. Sergim, and they ordained and appointed Sp. Oppins as affiliant to Appins Claudius for the de Kence and government of the city, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weal fred no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The onely fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their souldiers and citizens : all the blame els lay in the fouldiers themsclves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their own shame, and dishonour of their captains, to be defeated : for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and also by the Equians in Algianm discomfited. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and for tined upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, between Fiden: and Crustumenia. And when the enemie purioed them still and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them L in a pight battell, but flood upon their guard and defended themselves, trufting in the situation of the place and their rampier, and nothing upon their own manhood and force of arms. But in Algraum they committed a more foul and beattly fault, and received withall a greater loffe and overthrow; infomuch as having loft their camp with all their tents, the foldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harnels and implements of necessary use, retired for refuge to Tusculum, hoping there to be entertained as guelts, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their holts and friends : who failed and deceived not their expection. But to Rome there came fuch fearfull news, that the Senatours and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the citie and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the wals and guard the gates : they gave order allo to fend harne's and armour to suppy their want at Tusculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should aban- M don the calile at Tusculum, and with their fouldiers take the field and keep the camp . That they likewise should dislodge and remove from Fidene, that lay fortified there and remove into the countrie of the Sabines : fo that by making wars upon the enemies first, they might feare and divert them from purtoing their intent of giving affault unto the citie of Rome. Besides their damages and foils sustained at the enemies hands, the Decembers committed both in war abroad, and also in the civic at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one Le Sicius mar- L. Siccius, during their abode in the Sabines countrie (upon an odious conceit and malice against dered by the Decemvirs, had gone up and down, and in secret talke whispered in the ears of the Common fouldiers, fome menrion of creating Tribuns, and of another insurrection and departures him the Decemvirs dispatch before, to spie out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now N they had given those fouldiers in charge, whom they sent to accompanie him in that expedition to fet him upon him in some sit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own coit : for whiles he fought in his own defence, some of those that laid for his milchiefe, died for it, and lay along about him for companie : for being a right flout and ftrong man of his hands, he flood to it couragiously: and notwithstanding he was beset round about, he desended himself very mansully. The rest that escaped bring word into the camp, that Siccius was fallen unawares into an ambushment, and whiles he fought lustily, was with certain other of the fouldiers flain. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of fouldiers thither fent by the permission of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead : they observing none of their bodies there, to be disarmed and de-O spoiled, and Sicous lying in the midft of his armour, and all the reft of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemie, nor tooting of them departing from thence, brought away wirh them his dead carcasse, and made report that undoubtedly and passe all peradventure, he was murdred by his own companie. Herenpon was the whole camp filled with harred and detests:ion of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccius forthwith should be convaied to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made hast to solemnize his funerals souldierlike, at the publike charges of the common treaturie, So interred was he with exceeding forrow and mourning

A of the fouldiers, but to the most shameful obloquy and infamy of the Decemvirs, amongst the

Now followeth the other heinous deed committed within the City: which began of wanton The tragical luft, and had as foul and shameful an end, as that which upon the carnal abusing and bloody death History of Vir of Lucretia, cast the Tarquins out of the City, and deprived them of their regal dignity that both ginia. KK, and Decemvirs, might have not only the like success and iffue, but also one and the self same cause, of long their rule and dominion, Appius Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lufted to the abule and spoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Virginius, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidum, and had the leading there B of a company : a man of honest example and convertation of life, both at home and alto abroad in warfare. His wife likewife of vertuous disposition: so were their Children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had elpowled and ashanced his daughter in marriage to one L. Icilius, a man of flout courage (as having been Tribune) and whose vertue and valor had been well tried and approved in the quarrel and defence of the commonalty. This damfel in the prime of her years, paffing fair and beautiful withal, Appins (I lay) cast a fancy and liking unto, and so burned in love of her, that he affayed with gifts and fair promifes to win her good wil, But feeing all guarded and furely fenced with maidenly shamefaltness and honesty, he bent his mind wholly to cruel and proud violence. He inhorneth and setteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. (Laudius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid: and not to give place nor yeeld her C unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the fuit, and until shee brought proof of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was absent he had good opportunity to work this feat, and compass his intended in jury. As the maiden therefore was comming into the market place, (for there were the schools for peties kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to serve his matters luft) laid hold upon her, avowing that the was his bond-fervants daughter, and therefore his bond-maid: commanding her to follow him, and threatning besides, that if the made any stays, he would have her away perforce. The fearful girl hereat was amazed, and her nurse withal cried to the Quirits for help: whereupon the people came running and flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Virginian her father and likewife of Icilius her spouse, very gracious and popular: so that the love and favour D wherein they flood, raifed friends and acquaintance : and the indignity of the thing befides. moved the whole multitude to tender the cause of the damfel. When as there fore the was now past danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, faid there was no need that the people thus should gathertogether, for his meaning was to proceed only by order of law, and not with any violent course. And so he cited her to the court, minding to commence his action against her, and put her in suit. Then they that were present to assist her, persuaded her to follow. Now when they were come before Appins, sitting judicially upon his tribunal seat, the Plaintif, or challenger aforefaid, declareth against her, and telleth a tale ful wel known to the Judge himfelf, being the author and deviler of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his house, and by stealth was from thence conveied home to Virginius, and so was his E supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witnesses: and would make proof thereof to be most true, and let Virginius himself be the judg, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched : in the mean while, it was but meet and reason, that the bond-maid should go with her Master. The friends and advocates of the damsel, having aliedged and pleaded in her behalf, that Virginius was absent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reason, that whiles a father was away, he should be in contention and controversie about his children: they required of Appins therfore to defer and put off the heating of the whole matter, until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himself in that case made and provided, he would grant her to boar large and fland at liberty, for to bring in proofs

F that she was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maid of those years, ripe, and ready for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her goodname, then prejudiced in the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discourse before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and tendered the cause of liberty, and to that effect, alledged the sell same law which the friends of Virginius pretended for their purpose and demand. But so far forth, and no otherwise, should there be in that law assured safeguard of freedom, as the case altered not in circumstance of causes and persons. For, this priviledge and benefit held only in those that were claimed to be free, where any man who foever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his disposition there was no other man else, unto whom the Master that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his possession. His pleasure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That G the father should be sent for; and that in the mean season, he that made title to her, should not be prejudiced thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promiting and assuming to have her forth-coming, and to prefent her in Court, at the return of him who is pretended and nominated to be her father. Against this injurious decree, when as many nen rather muttered and murmured, then any one durst refuse and contradict it, P. Numitorius, the maids Uncle by the mother fide, and Icilius her espoused husband, hapned to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and prefs, the multitude thought verily; that by the coming, especially of Icilius, Appius might have been refifted and croffed, But then the Lictor pronounced that Appins, had passed an order and decree already, and put Isilins back: who cried out a loud (for to H manifest and horrib ea wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on firea right mild natured perion.) "Nay, Appias (quoth he)thou hadit more need to fet me back with "force of arms, if thou wouldit go clear away, and not be spoken to, for that which thou wouldit "do in hucker mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean shal go with me: I purpose to have her to my lelfe, an honeft and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawful marriage, as my wedded wife: « call therefore unto thee all the Lictors befides (thou were bet) that belong unto thy compani-"ons: caule both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Icilius his eiponfed wite, shall not abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Com-"mons of Rome the Tribuns affiltance and protection, and the priviledge of Appeal, two principal I bulwarks for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and to fulfilyour luft upon our children and wives too. Exercise your rigour and cruelty and spare to miniyour un upon our chimicana whee too. Extens your rigoni and chiefy and pare "not, upon our backs and fides in fcourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads also, in taking them from our shoulders: so ye sorbear to assail our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any "violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in * the behalf of my spouse and Virginia for himself will call to the souldiers, in regard of his on-"I) daughter we willcry for help of God and man; and coft it shall our lives before thou go away " with this decree, and put it in execution. I require and charge thee, O Appin therefore, to be "wel advised, and look how far thou dost proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, see to his "daughter, how he dealeth about her : and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give K "place to this plaintifs affertion, and forgo the prefent possession of her, he shall go seek his chare and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the freedom of my fpoufe, I will lofe my life, before I fail in my faithful promite to her made. Herest the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that some mutiny and fray would presently have enfued. For the Lictors had hemmed in Icilias on every fide, Howbeit they proceeded no farther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appins laid hard to Icilius, "That he did not "this io much in the behalf and desence of Virginini, as, (being himself an unruly person, and even "already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and seedition, Howbeit for his part he would not that day minister unto him any matter thereof, And "that he might now wel know, that he did not this to feed his malapert faucinels, but in re-L "gard of the absence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, "he would not that day fit to hear and determin the matter, nor award a definitive judgment in "that case: but would request Mar. Claudius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yeeld so 45 much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under sureries, and to be at her "liberty until the next day. But in case her father appeared not in Court the morrow after , he "gave Icilius, and fuch as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the "patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvirful in courage and resolution : neither would he cal together his fellow officers and fergeants, for to keep under such seditions and turbulent spirits "ashe was: but would content himfelf with his own Lictors, and do wel enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone afide, they agreed first M of all upon this point, that a brother of Icilius, and a fon of Numitorius, two lufty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginius should be sent for home from the camp: for that it stood the maid upon as much as her whole estate and life was worth; that he would be present and ready in due time the day sollowing, to preferre her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bidden, they fer forward, and spared no horsestell, until they brought tidings hereof to her father, all this while the plaintif that made challenge to the maid, was very instant with Icitius to bail her, and put in furcties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as he could, and did nothing elle: but indeed trifling out the time on purpose, until the messengers that were sent to the camp, were got afore welonward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all fides N held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Icilius, ready to become bound. Whereupon, he burft out into tears fortender heart, Gramercy (quoth he my mafters all, to morrow I wil use your helping hand: for this time I am speed of sureties enough, 'So was Virginia set at liberty, and bailed by the suretiship of her kinsfolk. Then Appius, after he had flayed a while, because he would not seem to have sat for that matter alone, when he saw all other fults and cau'es omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he arole, gat him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp, that they should not give Inginius his pasport, but keep him fast in durance, and inward. This wicked practife (as God would have it) came thort. For Virginius already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the fetting of the first watch. And very O early in the morning came the letters for to flay him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City reforted into the common place, flanding and waiting earneftly for his coming, And thither he himself being in soiled and simple array, brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and agreat number of Advocates and friends: Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only befought their affiftance by way of intreaty and prayer, but also required it as due and deferved: faying, that he stood dayly in field ready to fight indefence of their

A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardy exploits and valiant pieces of service in war, then of him self. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to fave the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befal unto Cities taken by theenemies? thus went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewise leilius call forth and redoubled like speeches freely and spared not. But the train of women, with their fill and filent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered All this not with standing, Appen in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly posses fed with a forcible (pixis of humorous madness rather then of amorous passion) ascended up into the tribunal. Where, as the plaintif first of himself was framing some short complaint, that by rea-Bionof partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and juffice the day paft: beiore that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leafure to Virginius for to put in his answer accordingly: Appine interrupted the speech, and began himself. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find, in so shameful a decree, that which carrieth but a shew and foundeth like a truth : therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to see down, even the sentence barely without any preface at all: namely, That he judged her in the be-batle of the Plaintif to be his bond-servant. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being ftrucken therewith aftonied, for a good while after, ftood ftill and held their peace. But afterwards, when as M: Claudius, went to lay hand on the maid, amongst the dames C that flood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then Virginius beckning with his hands and shaking them at Appins: "To Icilius (quoth he) have "I betrothed my daughter and not to thee O Appins: brought her up I have for honelt and chaft wedlock, and not for unclean and filthy whordom to be a wife another day, and not an un " harlot. Is this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beafts without all regard, to leap and run "upon you care not whom, and to fulfil your flethly lut? How these that be here wil suffer such pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with sword in hand, I hope, will never put them "up. Now when as he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that flood about her repelled back, then proclamed the Bedle and commanded filence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicate, and altogether carried away with unbridled luft, brake forth D and faid, That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and assured evidences, (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Icilius yesterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witness, and which might give fome light and prelumptions) That the night past, there were meetings and conventicles in the City, and all to raile a mutiny and injurrection : and therefore, he not ignorant of fuch a broil and tiot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by vertue of the majesty of government and authority, to repreis such as troubled the peaceable state of the City: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. Go Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to lay hand upon his bond-flave; and after he had thundred E out thele words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way : so the poor filly wench stood all forlorn and leit as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Vinginius feeing all past help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me first I befeech thee if upon a fatherly affection and grief of heart. I have let fal fome shrevid and curst words against thee more then was beseeming: Then, give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nurse the touth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hence better apayed and latisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nurle apart from the rost, near to the Church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this day Nova Taber- Virginia pitema,i.e. the new shops or standings: and there having caught a knife from a butcher, he thus outly killed by spake : My sweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to set thee free : and so he struck her rither Vin Pthe damiel to the heart; and looking prefertly to the judgement feat, Here with this blood I fa-ginius. crifice thee Appins, and thy head to the Devil. Appins with the crie that arole upon se horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended : but he with bloody blade in hand, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him apace to bear him company, he recovered the gate. Icilius and Numitorius took up the bloodle's corps, and held it aloft to the people. blaming and curfing the wickedness of Appiar: pitying the unhappy and unfocunate beauty of the damfel: and bewailing the hard exigent and extremity of the father. The Marrons followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and hearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chastity and virginity: with other like speeches, which in such a case, women in their grief of mind use to utter: whose forrow as it is G more heavy, proceeding from weakand tender hearts, so it yeeldeth and afforderh more pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their plaints and dolorous, moans, But the men and Icilius above the reft, had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the body of the people, how they were taken away from them, and of other publick indignities and common discontents. The whole multitude partly upon the hainousnels of this wisked act, and partly for hope by this occasion to recover againstheir liberties, were all up et on e in an uproar. Appius one

while commanded Icilius to be called, another while for his disched ence and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for

to come by him, passed himself with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his H guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to prilon. By which time there were gotten about Icilius not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horarius: who having thrust the sergeant back, said withal, that if Appin had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would bail leilins, and maintain his cause against him, who was bur a private person but if he went about to offer violence, he should foon meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce brawland broil. The Decemvirs officer ferteth upon Valerius and Horaiius to lay hold upon them: but his rods were by the multitude broken to pieces. Then Appins getshim up into the common place of andience, for to speak unto the people. Horaius and Valerius sollow after him up, to do the like. Them the affembly heard with I patience, but they histed at Appins and cried out against him. Then Valerius took upon him, and commanded the Lictors to give attendance no longer upon a private person. Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed and so standing in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himself in disguised manner, and took an house over his head, neer unto the common place (unknown to his advertaries) there to fave himself. Sp. Oppius, for to rescue and fuccour his Colleague, rushed from an other side into the place: and there he might see force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and confultations, wherwith he was diffracted, and framing himfelf to yeeld confent on every fide, at length by the advice and persyations of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. This appealed the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, K who many of them, feemed to millike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devised and took order, not to provoke the Commonstoo far: and withal to have a more provident and special eye, that the coming of Virginius into the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were fent certain of the puny Senators unto the holf, that lay encamped upon the hill Vecilius, who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavor all they could to keep the fouldiers in good order, from commotion and sedition, But there Virginius raised a greater uproar and tumust then he had lest behind him in the City. For besides that, he was seen coming with a crew and train almost of sour hundred men, who incensed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntary from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himfelf besprinkled and embrued with blood, cansed the whole L City, nis naked drawn kinic, and minical occupance and children from their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns feen in fundry places within the camp, made a greater flew of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the laft, when as now the multitude; that for fear ran confusedly together, began to stand still and keep silence-he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow fouldiers, he befought them not to impute that foul act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the author and cause: nor to detest and abhor him as a particide and murderer of his own children: saying, that his daughters life was more deat unto him then his own, if she might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw her once haled by force, as a bond-maid to be ravished and made a strumper, M he thought it better to be bereft of his children by death, then by contumely and reproach : and fo upon meer pirifulness incurred the fnew and appearance of cruelty. And but that he reposed fome hope in the aid of his fellow fouldiers, trusting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained a livefman after her. I know well (faith he) that you also have daughters, lifters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the luft of Appins, but rather the longer it escapeth unpunished, the more outragious and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well raught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand : and now my daughter, for that she might not finish the course of her days, with the fafety of her maiden head and chaftity, hath died, I confess, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an N honest kind of death. As to Appius, (quoth he) now can he not fulfil his lust in this my house: and for any other violence of his what loever, I carry the same mind and heart fill, to defend mine own body, wherewith I have already faved my daughters. Now let other men look to themselves and their children, as well as they can. As Virginius uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accorderied and protested, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and muintain their own freedom. The Cirizens also in their side gowns, intermingled among the fou diers, made the self same complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to be seen in fact, then they could found unto the ear by bare relation; and with al reported, how at Rome the matter was well neer dispatched already, for that there were certain come after them, even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appius had like O to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and so far prevailed they with them, that they gave the alarme, plucked up their standards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being fore troubled, both at their present occurrents which they evidently saw, and also to hear these news, in what bad tearms all things stood at Rome, rannp and down, here one, and there another, into fundry parts of the camp, for to appeale the tumult, When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beard them and answer, That they were men, and

A more then that men in arms and fouldiers. Thus march they in order of battel toward the City, and take the mount Aventine, and there settle themselves. And as they encountred any, all their fong was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchifes, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Nota word was heard else, tending to any violence. Oppius assembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any case: for as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition, But three ancient personages, such as had been Consuls, were sent Commissioners in Embassiage, as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. Inlius, and Publius Sulpitus with committion, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whose commandment they had abandoned the camp, or what their intent was thus in war-like manner to B keep the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native Country: They were not to feek of an aniwer, only there wanted a man to give the aniwer: for as yet they were grown to no certain head, upon whom they might rely : and fingly by themselves they durit not incurtine hatred and dangerous displeature that might ensue. This only the muleitude with one voicectied aloud, to fend L. Valerius, and Marcus Horasius unto them, for to those they would make a resolute answer. The Commissioners being dismissed, Virginius putteth the fouldiers in mind, and advertiseth them, how exewhile in a matter not of the greatest importance, they were intear and perplexity, because the multitude was without an head: and how an anlwer was returned, although not altogether unprofitable and befides the purpose, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any publick counsel. But now his opinion was, that there should be tenchosen to bear soveraign rule: who for the honour of warfare and souldiery, Brould be called military Tribuns, And when this dignity was to him offered firft, Nay (quoth he) releave still these your good perswasions and judgments of me, unto more happy days and favourable times both to me and you. For neither doth the remembrance of my daughter fuffer me to take joy of any howour in this life, nor (as the flate flandeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magistrates, who of all other are most exposed to ill will and displeasure, and in neerest danger to be hardly thought of if I may serve you in any stead, you may make bold, and haveno less use ofme, remaining still a private person. So they create Tribuns military, ten in number. But all this while was the army as unquiet in the Sabins country. For even there also, by the infligacion of Icilius and Numitorius, the fouldiers fell away from the Decemvirs and de-D parted. For their minds were no leis troubled and disquiered with the remembrance renued, of the late murder of Sicoins, that kindled and fet on fire by the fresh news of the death of Virginia, fo villanously; so shamelesly laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfie the lust of another. Icilim, foloon as he heard fay, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, feating left the Election in the City should follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a predecent to create the self same men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well seen and experienced in these popular affairs, and reaching himself at the same dignity and promotion, wrought fo with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they should likewise elect the self same number with equal authority. Who entred the City with banners displayed, at the gate Collina, and marched through the midft thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And E there joining and uniting themselves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for loveraign governors to rule all, So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Manilius. The Senators being in great care for the Common-weal, fat in Councel every day: where they from time oftner in wrangling and jarring, then in lage advice and politick couniel. The murdering of Siccius, the wanton luft and loofe life of Appius, the shameful disgraces received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs dish. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horatins should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Enfigns and Ornaments of that Magistracy and government, which by right they should have forgon and departed from, a full year before. The Decemvirs were grie-F ved and complained, thus to be fet down & made no better then private menandiaid flatly they would not be deposed from their place of rule, before those laws werefully enacted and confirmed for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Duslius (who had been a Tribun of the Commons) that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senat houle, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventure unto mount Sacer. For Duslius ceased not to suggest, and plainly aftirm unto them, that the Senators and Ancients of the City would never fally think upon any care and provision to be made, until they find the City abandoned and deviolate: moreover, That the mount Sacer would put them in mind of the contant resolution of the Commons; and that they should well know, that matters would never be seled and brought to concord, without they restored unto them their powers as they passed along; of collowing therein the modesty of their forefathers. The whole Commonates they assed and encamped themselves in the mountain Sacer; doing no harm to any creature as they passed along; of collowing therein the modesty of their forefathers. The whole Commonates they assed and tarried behind. Their children and wives bare themcompany, in piecus wife moaning the research and the should be the deliver. and none to be seene in the publick place, besides a lew of aged mentand when the Senators were H called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlorn: then there were more befides Horatins and Valerins that cried out and faid, What look you for fill my LL, of the Councel ? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevish frowardness, will ye let things run at fix and feven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you embrace fo in your arms, that you clip and hold fo faft? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not abashed and ashamed, that there should be seen in the Place, a greater number well neer of your Lictors and " officers, then of gowned Citizens, and of all other men what oever? How and if the enemies " fhould come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should I " march in arms, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure so lightly? Will ye, together With the ruin and downial of the City, end your rule, and not afore? Well, to be plain, ye must "either have no Commons at all, or elie allow them to have their Tribuns again: there is no Ge mean, there is no other remedy. Sooner shall we want our Magistrates of the Nobility, then "they will be without their Patrons and Officers of the Commonalty, They wring and wrested "from our forefathers that power and authority fire new, and whereof they had as then, no "proof and experience: how think ye then, that having tasted now the sweetness of it, they "will endure the want thereof? especially seeing, that we our own selves are not of so tempe-"rate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of iomesisccour and relief. And when there and such like reasons were on all hands often alledged and laid K. abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general confent and unity of the house, promised: That feeing it was fo thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators. This only they belought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safety and security of their persons and not by shedding their blood, to flesh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exercising cruelty upon the nobles and Senators. Then were Velerius and Horasius fent with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such tonditions and capitulations, as they should think convenients yea, and to fet all things in good order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the L Commons, as being doubtless, their very laviours and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving, Icilius was the mouth of the multitude, and their prolocutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that these Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they flood upon? Being already provided asorehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it The demands was well feen, that they reposed more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indiffemons in moun rency, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power onfoot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons. Item, that no man should be called in question, nor M any way touched in lite, limb, or goods for gathering the fouldiers or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their liberties and franchifes. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, savoured of cruelty. For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should be yeelded into their hands, and then they threatned to burn The answer of them quick with fire. To these Articles the Committees spake in this wife, "As for those capitu-"lations, which upon counsel and deliberate advice ye have articled, they are so reasonable and Horasius to the st indifferent, that without your fuit, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and free-"ly: for ye request to enjoy such things as concern the defence of your liberty and freedom, and " maintain not your licentioniness, to the offence and hurt of others. But as to your ire and wrath, "it is to be pardoned, rather then to be followed and yeelded unto: as who, under colour of N "hatred and detestation of cruelty, run headlong into cruelty; and before, in a manner, that yebe " fer free your selves, ye will be Rulers and Lords over your Adversaries, Alas the while, and will "our City never be at rest, and cease from punishing: but that either the Nobles will scourge the "Commons of Rome or the Commons whip the Nobles? Great was the accord, alacrity and cheerfulness, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turn their flandards and enfigns, and as they marched to to Rome, they strove with all they met on the way, who could shew most joy and gladness: they pais on through the City armed as they were, yet peaceably and without moile, until they came ared again. into the Aventine. Duillius, who before the chusing of Decemvirs, had right worthily and notably born the Tribunship, and in all combats and commotions with the Decemvirs, stuck close to the Commonalty and never failed them. After these were elected, more for hope then any former delett, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C Icilius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribunship, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the departure and infurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs, should not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay M. Duilling went through with an act of his own, to wit, That there should be Con-E fuls created, with refervation of liberty to appeal unto the people. Then, by an Inter-regent were Confuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently Confuls elec-Flaminius. began their government. Whose popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Se-ed again. nators and Nobles, to it was not without some offence committed of their part: For what soever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abridged somewhat of their power and authority. And first and formost, whereas it was a question and controverse not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to fland to the Acts of the Commons they made a law now in a general Seffion, by the suffrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance soever the F Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribuns acts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal Moreover, The other Consular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and strength of liberty, which by the Determins absolute power had been overthrown, they not only revive again, but also fortifie the same for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding exprelly that no man should create any magistrate absolutely without the liberty of appealing: and wholoever should creat any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthned the Commons, on the one fide with the benefit of appealing, and on the other fide with the Tribuns power in favour of the Tribuns themselves, that they also might seem sacrosanct and inviola-G ble/a thing now almost grown out of remembrance) they renewed that high priviledg, with certain folemn ceremonies, which having been of long time laid ande & neglected, were now brought up again and put in tre. And they ordained them to be inviolate as wel in a reverent regard of religion and cruple of conscience as also by a special law in that behalf provided : namely that whofoever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons, Ediles Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should be ac- * proferpinal curied and devoted to Jupiter and his family fold in port-fale at the Church of Ceres, Libr & Li- Jesundum Arbers. By vertue of this Act, the great Expositors of the law deny that any man is a sacrosanct or 1800, or 660. inviolable: but (lay they) it is enacted only, That who over hurr any of them, shall be accurred.

And therefore an Ædile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates. Which H aithough it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it. is a good argument to prove, that an Ædile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by vertue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable: as they would feem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law, That in this felf fame Act of Horatius, the Consulsalio, yea, and Pretors too, because they are created by the same auspicia or bird-signs that the Consuls be) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Consul is called by the name of a Iudg. But that exposition is consuted, for that in those days it was not the manner to tearm the Conful a Judge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Confular Laws. I

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ædiles of the Commons: which aforetime were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Confuls. After all this, M. Duillius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pais and granted it, That who oever should leave the Commonalty destitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his headfor it. Allthese Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles : to they went clean without their contradiction : for that, all this while hitherto, there was, no rigour and leverity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and also the Commons freedom, were once K well and furely grounded : Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might falely and without peril give the onfet upon them, feverally one by one, made choice of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintif, and Appius Claudius the first desendant, And Virginius had not so foon arrested Appins to answer at a day, and Appins come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the fight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detettable tyranny was refreshed and renued. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful " canfes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty " ye have by force of arms delivered your felves: nor fuffer this wretch, over and befides his other " wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as tou- L "ching all other lewed parts of thine and wicked defignments, O Appius, which thou half for "these two years ungrationsly and impiously enterprized and practised one on the neck of ano-"ther, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst "acquit thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Judge, against all order of Law, didst " not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the "fuit depending, until the might bring proofs of her freedom; for this, I fay, I command thee "to prilon. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succour: and also feeing himself tugged and haled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom, being heard to come out of that M mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused tilence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wife: "I see well (when ail is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect not "the affairs of mortal men. Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will jurely have "a fall, and throughly be punished. Lo, how he is now fain to appeal, who atoretime abolished " and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under "foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and dee prived of the benefit of liherty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bandage and fervi-"tude, Amidst these words, I say, that might be overheard in that consused humming of the assembly bly, Appins also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned N "up withal, the deferts of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and Appins moveth Gabroad in the wars: he alledged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Commothe people in alty of Rome, and partaking with them and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the * natty or kome, and pattaking this own behalf or to bring in and effablish equal and indifferent "Nobility, he resented up his Consultational participation between the promise the remaining the rem " laws to both parties. He rehearled moreover his own laws, which not with tanding they remai-"ned fill in force and frength, he the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his "own proper parts and deferts good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he faid) when he "shoud be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the com-"mon benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for "himself & fland to the doom of the people neither feared he the hatred & malice of men so much o "asto repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens, But and if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again " call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonth them, not to follow and "imitatethem, whom they would feem to hate. And in case the Tribuns will be known and avow that they are linked in the same bond and covenant to abolish and take away the benefit of cal"ling unto any one of them by way of mediation (against which they have charged & blamed the

Against all this, Virginius made his R rejoinder and faid, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane fociety. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there mitted to pri-"was none misliked of this proceeding, so every man was greatly troubled in spirit, to see so great fon; " a personage punished, and the very Commons thmselves thought their liberty too large & ex-" ceffive. The Tribun let him down a day (before hand) to plead for himself and make his answer, Amid these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token wereof, they brought as a prefent unto Jup. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very maffie in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Æquians and Volscians prepared war with all the power they could make. E Whereupon, the Confuls were commanded to part their provinces between them. To Horatins befel the Sabins, and to Valerius the Æquians and Volscians. And when they had proclamed muflers against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not only the younger folk, but also a great fort of these that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their penfions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster-Masters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodness of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced souldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables.) they fet up openly to be seen, engraven in brass. Some writers have delivered, that the Ædiles performed this office, as they had it in charge The Laws cale From the Tribunes. C. Claudius, who upon a detestation and deep hatred of the Decemvirs level led the twelve and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the insolent pride of his brothers son, Tables. which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillus, his old native country. He being now a very aged man returned to fue and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whole vices he abhorred: and in fullied weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his linage, and other his followers and vaffals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one, "Befeeching them not to fet that brand of ignominy, and bring such a " ftain upon the house and name of the Claudis, as that they should be thought worthy of impri- C. As for himself,

" he protested that he did thus much for kindred and names sake. Neither was he reconciled un-

"to him and they made triende again: yet could he wish, that his adverse fortune and poor con"dition were relieved. Concluding with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by vertue & prowefs fo the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindness and love, then in any ge- H spect of him for whom he spake. But Virginius prayed them, "To take pity and compassion ra-"ther, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Clau-" dit, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the neerest friends of Vir-" ginia, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and fuccour of the Commons, do now themselves implore and beseech the help and affistance of the Commons, And verily these rears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appins law all means of hope cut off, before the foretaid day appointed was come, killed his own felf. Soon after this, Sp. Oppins, who of all the rest unto Appius, was most hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and sentence of his Colleague hapned to be pronounced, was attached by T P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worle thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by him elf done, then for not stopping the wrong intended by Appear to Virginia. For a witnesse was produced to depose against him, one, who having served in the wars seven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant servitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and fight of the people of Rome tent his garments, and shewed his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scourging: beleeching no other favour, but if Oppius the party accused, could justly charge him with any trespass and offence by him committed, he should not spare him, but now a private person as he was, exercise Oppins dieth in and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppins likewise was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appins and Oppins both, the Tribuns did confif- K cate. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fied their country and were banished, and all their goods also were for seit & conflicat. And not so much as M. Claudius the party that laid claim unto Virginia escaped, but he was arrested to answer at a certain day, and was condemned. Howbeit Virginius of himself released him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to Tybur, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginia more happy after her death, then fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted fo many houses for due revenge of her adversaries : at last, when there was not one guilty perion of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and rested quiet. Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the same countenance already in the Tribuns, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duillius, a Tribune of the Commons, L. wifely and politically restaining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: "We "have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies : and ther-"fore I will not fuffer for this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I do not like " that old faults done and pair, and now as it were cancelled and rafed out, should be revived a-" gain, and brought in quellion, fince that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath "been made for the new and the continual care and diligence of the Confuls both twain, for the " maintenance of your reedom affureth me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may " require and need the power of the Tribunes, This moderation at the first hand of the Tribun, put the Nobles out of their fear: but made the Confuls to be thought the worle of, (for that they had been so addicted, wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more M regard of the lafety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility : and because the adverse part had their sul of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Confuls would once feem to ftop the course and fream of their licentiousness. And many there were who gave it out, that the Confuls bare themselvs too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were proposed by the Tribuns. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time.

When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the City, and surely grounded the state of the Commonalty, they went either of them into their own Province, Valerius against the armies of the Aquians and Volicians, which now had joined together in Alsidum: where ful po-N litickly he held off, and stood upon his defence only for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battel, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt confidering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presentig upon the unfortunat conduct of the Decemvirs)it would have turned to their great loss, and cost them an overthrow. He therfore having encamped a mile off from the enemies kept his fouldiers within the camp. The enemies ranged in battel array took up the whole ground between both camps, & when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Volicians and Æquians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battel, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yeelded unto them, departed: fome into the country of the Hernicks, other some to the territories of the Latins, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a com-O petent guard for desence of the camp, then a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Conful perceived, he paid them again with the like measure offear, as they before had from them received; and with his army ready embattelled, bids them butel: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbare to fight; whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had flood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed

A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hearty and couragious, fend out messengers every way in learful hast, to call again the forragers. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day light, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an affault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies firred not at all, the Conful commanded to advance with their enfigns. The Aquians and Volkians seeing their battell coming forward, began to chase and take foul distain, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest B likewife themselves with their Generals for the fignal of battell, and at length after much importunity obteined it. Now were some of them salined out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coss, before the batter of the enemies flood surely surnished with their full firength, came on fill and gave the onfet: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and erethey were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to .amuze their troubled heads the more, he assails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their ipirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every fide rated them, and asked them whether C they would yeeld unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renued. "The Conful on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first

"day, wherein they being newly fet free, were to fight likewife for the freed City of Rome: and The Oration "day, wherein they being newly let tree, were to ngit thewate for the free unity of kome; and of Platins the "therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize Consulto his "for any more Decemvin to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and ftan-fouldiers, "dard of Appias, but of the Conful Valerins: who as he was descended from the deliverers of "the people of Rome, so he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in for-"mer battels of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the fouldiers, that they atchieved "no victories: faying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomack against their " own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies; and to have stood more in fear D of fervitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginia, the was but one, whose honesty "and chassity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in regard of his unbridled and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war

" should fail on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abu-"fed and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to "prefage fuch mileries and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Inpiter. "and our flock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon fo lucky figns and "happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Avenine Hill, and Mount Sacer: that where within their few months you recovered your freedom, thither ye "may carry back again your Empire, safe and sound, unsteined and unsoiled: that all the World E "may keethat Roman fouldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the Decemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indiffe-"rent Laws, the manhood and prowers of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor dimist nished. Having uttered these words among the enligns of the footmen, he made speed to the "corners of the Horsemen, Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and fand chivalry; like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and en-"scounter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hand, fet figures to, gallop after them apace, and chafe them out of the plain field: they will never abide Wyour violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and ftand rather at a ftay, than make "any refistance. Hereupon they gird out luftily, and run their horses among the enemies, dif-F ordered already, and in diarray by the service of the sootmen. And having broken through their ranks, and paffed forth even to the rereward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all fides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and scared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Conful himself, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, affailed the tents, won them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a

When news of this battel was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and solemnity: but in the camp it fet the fouldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honor and renown. G Now had Horatius already partly by fending his fouldiers forth, to make incursions and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves and have confidence in their owngood service, rather than to remember the shamefull difgrace and foil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those small bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heartned them in affured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still lufty upon their good furcels the year before; cealed not to provoke and urge their enemies : very oft asking them what they meant after the guile of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out

The enemies ranged in battel array took up the whole ground between both camps,& when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Volscians and Æquians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battel, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yeelded unto them, departed: fome into the country of the Hernicks, other some to the territories of the Latins, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a com-O petent guard for defence of the camp, then a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Conful perceived, he paid them again with the like measure offear, as they before had from them received; and with his army ready embattelled, bids them buttel: who being prive to themselves what forces were wanting, forbare to fight; whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had flood thus a who'e day ready to fight, they recired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed

A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hearty and couragious, fend out messengers every way in searful hast, to call again the forragers. Such as were near at tend out menage back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met manu came to the nit was once day light, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an affault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies firred not at all, the Conful commanded to advance with their enfigns. The Aquians and Volkians feeing their battell coming forward, began to chafe and take foul disdain, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field; and were earnest B likewife themselves with their Generals for the fignal of battell, and at length after much importunity obtained it. Now werefome of them falsed out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coff, before the batter of the enemies flood furely furnished with their full strength, came on still and gave the onset: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and ere they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their sellows: and to amuze their troubled heads the more, he assails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every fide rated them, and asked them whether C they would yeeld unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renued, "The Conful on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first "day, wherein they being newly fet free, were to fight likewife for the freed City of Rome: and The Oration "day, wherein they being newly let tree, were to fight likewile for the free disty of Kome: and of Pulvius the therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize Consulto his "for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and itan- fouldiers, "dard of Appius, but of the Conful Valerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of "the people of Rome, to he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in for-"mer battels of lare dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the fouldiers, that they at chieved no victories: faying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomack against their " own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies; and to have stood more in sear D " of fervitude at home, than of bondage abroad, As for Virginia, the was but one, whose honeity "and chastity was in time of peace hazarded : and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in " regard of his unbridled and diffolute luft, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war " fhould fail on our fide, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abu-"fed and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to 5 prefage fuch mileries and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Inpiter. "and our flock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon lo lucky figns and "happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Avenine Hill, and Mount Sacer : that where within thele few months you recovered your freedom, thither ye "may carry back again your Empire, safe and found, unsteined and unfoiled: that all the World E "may feethat Roman fouldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the De-"cemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indiffe-"rent Laws, the manhood and prowels of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor dimi-

Counter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hand, fer figures to, gallop after them apace, and chale them out of the plain field: they will never abide "your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and frand rather at a flay, than make "any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lustily, and run their horses among the enemies, dis-F ordered already, and in disarray by the service of the sootmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the rereward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all fides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and scared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Conful himself, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, affailed the tents, won them, and befides a great flaughter, obtained a f nished. Having uttered these words among the enfigns of the footmen, he made speed to the

"comers of the Horlemen. Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and

% and chivalry; like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and en-

When news of this battel was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into che Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and folemnity: but in the camp it fet the fouldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honor and renown. G Now had Horatius already partly by fending his fouldiers forth, to make incursions and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves and have considence in their own good service, rather than to remember the shamefull difgrace and foil received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those small bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heartned them in affured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still lusty upon their good success the year before, cealed not to provoke and urge their enemies: very oft asking them what they meant after the guile of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out the time, and thus by peece meal to make of one entire battel many petty and small skirmishes? H Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to see unto what side she will incline. Then the Romans, befides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this challenge also set on fire: confidering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to infult and crow over them with reproachful tearms: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever be able to make their parts good? So foon as the Conful perceived the fouldiers thus to mutter and mumble within the camp, he aftembled them all together, and thus hefpake: "Sirs(quoth he) what success hath been, and how the service hath sped in Algidum, I suppose you have al- I "ready heard, namely, such as beseemed the army of a freestate and people. By the policy of my "fellow Consul, and the manhood of his souldiers together, atchieved is the victory. As for my "felf, that course will I take, and that resolute mind will I carry, which you my souldiers shall se afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and " ended speedily: If protracted it shall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the " fame discipline fill I wil exercise you, and bring to pass, that your hope and prowels may encrease "every day more then other. If your hearts now serve you wel, and that you like to fight it out, "Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing hearr and valorous prowels, now fet "up fuch a cry and fhout, as you wil make when you first join battel, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheerfulness shouted aloud: God bless us all (quoth he) I wilful- K fil your defire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was best owed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins to foon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battel array, came forth also themselves, as ready and defirous of fight, as they. Here was a battel struck, such as might beleem two armies, that truffed on both fides in their own valour, and made ful account of that days honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victory lately atchieved. The Sabins besides, mended their strength wel with a stratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they referved two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans: L they advancing overthwart with their enfigns, & flanking them on the one fide, preffed shrewdly upon that one point, and overcharged it, wel neer environed all about Then the horsemen of two legions, 600, almost in number, alight on foot from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them again, for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldness and animated them to fight, For abashed they were, that horsemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and prosessed footmen not able to countervail the horsemen, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battel, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they M had loft. And in a trice, at one instant, not only the fight was renued, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the sootmen, gat again to their horses, and from thence rod speedily unto the other side, reporting to their sellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their fide was discomfitted : neither were there any in this battel also, that were seen to perform better service then they. The Consul, as an overseer, beheld all the manner of it, praising those that flood to it mansfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not fo soon chastised and reproved but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did right good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the ene N mies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies, as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had loft by the forraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory atchieved in two fundity battels, the Senat right foatingly (fuch was their mifery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Confuls, one days thankfiving and proceffion, and nomer. But the people, the fecond day likewife, without order and warrant from authority, folemnized the fame in great numbers. And this popular proceffion, diforderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Confuls of the purpole (as it was agreed afore) came within the compafe of thofe two O days into the City: and fummoned the Senat to affemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make fome speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was a affembled on purpose, among the souldiers, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Confuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Planting, where now the Temple of Apale Annals, a place which even then they called Circus Apollismat when they being denied triumph with one voice and general consent of the nobles, Licitims

A a Tribun of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Coniuls triumph, And among many that Hepped forth to crois and diffwade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud, that the Coff, intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they lought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any vertue and worthy ack. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there hed any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senate, to confider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majefty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribuns then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by vertue of their authority, as to suffer no publick

B counfel at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and eftate retaineth ftill their own priviledge, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the reft of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect all the Tribes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voyces of the people, without the authority and affent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonstry, shad like to have turned to a dangerous suffeir of licentious liberty by reason that the Tribuns conspired together and were fully agreed, to be choien Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition should be less teen above others, they alledged to the Coss, for a sufficient reacon (that they likewise should continue still in piace of government) the agreement and consent of the Senators: through whose sholding together and drawing in one line the liberties of the Com-che Senators: through whole holding together and drawing in one line the liberties aged. For mons, to the great digrace and reproach of the Confuls, were intringed and indammaged. For what would come of it, say they, it before the late Laws were fully established the (new) Confuls with their factious banding, should let upon the new Tribuns: for we must not look to have alwayes such as the Homain and Valeri, to be Confuls, men that would not regard their own weal before the freedom of the commonalty. As it happed very well for that time, it fell to M. Duillius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, forfeeing the heart-burning and harred, like presently to ensue, upon the continuance of the same Magistrates still in place said flastly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free D scrutiny, or else yeeld up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly, unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and plearaure of the Roboles: Duillius then, seeing their earnest contention, caused the Consuls to be called into their own pues and seast, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they assemble and managed their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they assemble and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out not cheir presence, and were asked their good fervice in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them constant in the E same minds still, and nothing alered from their resolutions after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadast perfect units to the last (as altogether unlike to the Decembirs) went presently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribuns only, seeing there were notother competitorise enough to reach unto sufficient voyces of the Tribus, in comparison of theorether nine. Tribuns his colleagues, who openly stood to be chosen agains he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had suffilled the Law in that behalf, which without setting down any precise and definite number of Tribuns, so that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chase and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I shall propound ten Tribuns of the Commons to be the question, what they would do, in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time; and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for Forested, and they (ball that prefent day make fewer than ten: they by vertue of this Law, [ball be accounted Tribins; whom those deticted hall easile and take unto them for their fellows, and as lamful [ball forested this] they be held, as those whom this day re [ball create Tribins of the Commons. Thus when Daillius perfitted ftill refolute unto the end, laying, That in any case the state might bear five and twenty Tribins and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great savor and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribins now in the electing and making choise of their companions, cilitied savour with the Senators, and stanied themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them two of the Nobility, and those that had been Consilis, to with 5, P. Tarjests and An. Electrons. And Consuls there were created. Sp. Herminius and Titus Virginius Calimontanus. Who bearing themselves in a meanbe-

G tween Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one fide or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Ls. Trebonius, a Tribun of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators, and fpightfully bent against them, and faying withal, that in the coptation of the rest of the Tribuns, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, proposed a Law. That whosever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, should not give over, but still propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribunship in perfectuage and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: wherenoon lie was surnamed Appro-

After this, M. Geganius Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Con uls, appealed the conten-H tions Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against that authority of the Tribuns, they preserwed fill the foveraign Majelly of the Nobles: and by means of decreeing mutters against the wars of the Volicians and Æquians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord: faying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, forrainers took heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intelline concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were still and in good temper, the puny Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have assisted the weaker side, at first it booted little, I and mall good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter moneths, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier fort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weak. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunfhip, unless they might have fuch as Icilius to be Tribuns : and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other fide, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lufty: fo they were of this mind, That if there needs must be tretpass and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomack, than their adversaries. So ticklish and K dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whiles under a colour of wishing and desiring equality, every man advanceth and lifteth up himself so, as that he thrusteth and beareth down another : and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and seasful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our felves, we impose upon others. As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furins: who found neither sedition within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand, For now could no longer the diffention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out, And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings L of the people, one or other alwayes of the Nobles and Senators were ferved with process: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the fignal of battel had been given, and the al'arm firicken up, the Æquians and Volscians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (fuch as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and perswaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their alleagance: which was the only cause that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious looseness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For, all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forcein nations, was now turned upon their own M felves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprise them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they camr foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories walt. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Corbio. Quintius the Conful feeing this, affembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wife. " Albeit "I am not privy to my felt, and my conscience accuseth me not of any fault, O Quirites, yet am N "I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you the people of Ghou'd know, or the posterity hereafter understand, how the Æquians & Volscians (who of late "dayes were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintius was the fourth timeCol. " in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome. & went their wayes "again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shameful dishonor, if I had known it "would have light, so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath so gone. and fuch hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no "goodness toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death, if "there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time " of my Confulfhip, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valo- O "rous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already then had I lived long enough, "and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Conful, But who "were they, I pray you, whom these most bale and cowardly enemies of ours, despited and set so "light by: Were we they that are your Confuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were "in the fault, take from us as unfufficient & unworthy perions our rule and government and it tha" be not enough let us over and besides be wel punished, and abide the smart. But if the blame be "in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastise your trespass and offence, only do you repent

A "your selves, and be sory therefore. It was not your cowardise that they scorned and despised nei-"ther was it their own valour wherein they trufted. For why? they having been so often deseated " and driven out of the camp and the field, fined with forfeiture of Lands, sorced to go under the "gallows, and brought into servitude, knew very well both themselves and you also. No, no the "variance and discord between our own states and degrees, is the only bane, and nothing elfe, of "this City; the jarres and debates, I say, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither "we have any gage or stay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty: "while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and we likewife of the Commoners Magistrates, they " gave gotten heart, and wax bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would B you have? Tribuns of the Commons yelonged and fought after: for quietness and concord fake, we let you have your longing, Decemvirs you had a great mils of, and them you defired: we er granted and permitted them to be created. Weary you were anone, and all too weary of De-"cemvirs: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued ttill against "them, being become private perions again, we inferred to be put to death, and to be exiled most conoble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect anew your Tribuns of the Com-"mons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your own faction, al-"though we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we feen that dignity proper "to Nobility, given away as it were, and made common with the Commonalty. The affiltance of "Tribuns, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts devised by the Commons, to be ten-" dered and imposed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and co-"lour of Isonomi, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and priviledges should be over-"thrown, we have abidden, and do still endure. When will there be an end once of discord and "diffention? Shall we never have one City of it? Shall we never have this to be the common "Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished than "whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you, that you are dread and feared of us? but fill "you feek for more? Against us it was, that you took the Mount Aventine, against us it was that " vou held and kept the Mountain Sacer. For when the gate Esquilina, was wel-neer surprised by "the enemy, and when the Volscians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and " to scale our walls, none of you there was to be seen, for to remove and set them fatther off. A-D " gainst us ye play the men against us ye can be armed. Well then go to: When ye have here befer "the Senate-house, taken up the market place and common Hall with souldiers, filled the goal "with Noblemen, and those of the chiefest and best quality, then with like courage and stoutness " of heart, fally forth of the gate Esquilina. Or, if you dare not venture so much, behold and view al "afore you from the walls discover your Lands and territories with fire and sword wasted & con-" fumed, your goods and cattel had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houses "burning and imoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by "this means is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired the City besieged, and the enemy goeth his way with the honor of the war. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private " estate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly, from out of his own livings E " and possessions, of his proper losses and what have you at home (if a man may ask) to make sup-" ply again? Will the Tribuns make you restitution, and amends for all your damages? You shall " have words of them your fill. They will not flick to speak to rail, and let fly slanders freely before " you against the heads of the City. Laws upon Laws you shall have heaped thick and threefold." "Assemblies convocations, and seditions invectives good store. But from the etheir assemblies, " never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one gray groat or single denier, nor in 4 better state to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife & children but hatred and malice, displeasure and rancour, grudges and heart-burnings, both publick and private? From which at all times ye have been shielded and defended, if not with your own " vertue and innocency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye ferved in wars F " under the conduct of us your Confuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribuns: when you "ferved I say in camp, and not in the Hall and commonplace: when in battel your enemies quaked "to hear you shout and not in your assemblies, the Romans were in dread of your mas and out-" cryes: then you wan prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home "with triumph to your houses, sul of riches and wealth sul of honor and renown; as well publick "as private. Whereas now, you fuffer your enemies to depart, fraught and laden with your "goods. Stick to your Ward-Leets, as if you were nailed and tast pinned to them : dwell still in "your Hall, and lead your lives continually there: yet must you needs war when all is done, sty from it as fast as you can. Grieved it you indeed, and thought you it a trouble and painful thing, to "take an expedition fo far as into the Volscians and Æquians country? Lo, the war is come even G "unto your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will scale the "Caffle and Capitol it will follow you even into your houses. Two years ago, the Senate gave or "der and commanded that there should be souldiers mustered, and an army conducted into Algi-"dum. But we fit stil at home & do nothing, but chide & scold (as it were) one at another like curst " and shrewd women, contenting our selves, and joying in a present peace: and little seeing, that of "that rest, there will come fundry wars again, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are " speeches more pleasing & plausible than these. But to speak the plain truth for your good rather "than to flatter and footh for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not teach and

"admonish me, even very necessity doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most H "willing, O Quirites, to please you: but much more would I have you to be in safety, think what-" foever ye will of me. It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who fo spea-" keth to a multitude in his own cause, and for himself, is better liked, and heard with more ap-" plause, than he whole mind aimeth at nothing else but a publick weal, Unless peradventure you think thele common flatterers, these clawbacks, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, net-"ther in war nor peace, do ftir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the " truth? ye being once foliicited and pricked on by them, ferve their turns in good flead, either 6 for their honor or gain. And because they see themselves to be of no worth and regard, while "the states do agree, they desire to play imall game, rather than to sit out : to be Captains of mil- I " ru e and lewdness, rather than of nothing : and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders and guides of troubles and diffentions. Whereof, if you be so bleft and happy, as to be weary now at length, and will betake your felves to the ancient manners and fashions, both of your own, "and of your anceltors, in lieu of these new fangles, I will refuse no punishment: nay, let me be " put to the most shameful death that is, if I do not before many dayes pass over my head, defeat, "discomfit and put to flight these robbers and destroyers of our fields, and send them packing out " of their own camp, and finally translate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are " to affrighted and altonied, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities. Seldom at any time elfe, had there been a ipeech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharp Orationat this prefent of a most severe Consul. Yea, and K the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse souldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now defired war and to be in armes. Over and besides, the country kerns that sled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were presented unto their eyes, and set all the City in anhot an angry broil. Now when the Senators were assembled together in the Councel House, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintius, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spake out and said: That he had made an Oration, befeeming the loveraign Government of a Conful, befeeming to many Confulfhips by him already born beleeming the whole course of his life, that had passed of through many honorable digni- L ties, and yet alwayes deserved more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or elle in feeking by hard courses to maintain the rights, preheminencies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintius, he hath made a speech, respective and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Conful, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would request the Tribuns likewile, to joyn in one accord with the Confuls, and shew themselves willing and forward to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a cale, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying more- M over, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid now that the territories are wasted, and the City at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a muster, and presently to make a levy of souldiers. And when the Confuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there affembled that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger fort, should betimes the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names: and that he should be taken for a traytor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City shewed themselves the morrow after in readiness. Each cohort or regiment chole their Centiners or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their N Provost Marshals. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensigns were by the Questors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (orten a clock) the fame day, fer forward and advanced our of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old fouldiers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and rested, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped close unto them. And by the third day, there was no flay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight. For why? The Romans for anger were sharp set: the enemies again, upon a guilty conscience that they had to often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Confuls were in equal commission, yet gave Agripps place unto his brother Quintims and yeelded O unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most prostable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again incourtely answered and requited the others Gentleness and inclination to submission, in this wife, by imparting unto him all his Counsels: by parting with him all his honor and praise, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferiour and underling. In the battel, Quintins commanded the right pont, Agrippa led the left : Sp. Posthumius Albus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battel. And P. Suspitime the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen. The foot-

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volscians received them with equal valour. Sp. Splanius with his men of arms, brake through the main battel of the enemies: & albeit he might have retired himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were disarayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomt ted and quite defeated his enemies, by affailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Volscian and Aquian Horsemen recharged him, held him play in his own fight, and so kept him occupied a good while. "Thereat, Sulpitius faid, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to bestirthemselves, "crying out aloud, that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded B "from their own fellows, unless they let to, and bent their wholeforce, quickly to dispatch the "Horse-fight: and that it would not serve, to put the Horsemen to flight and save their lives: but " kill both horse and man, that none might ride back again from thence into the battel to renew "the fight. And to make head and relatance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, "fince that the main thick battel of footmen had given him ground already, Good ear they gave to his words, and foon harkned to his direction: and with one entire affault they gave a fierce charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallery, unhorsed and dismounted a number of them, and with their javelins goared both them and their horses. And there's an end of the horsefervice. Then they fet upon the battel of the footmen, and dispatched messengers unto the Consuls with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battel of the enemies began to c shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged: but the Equians that were about to retreat, were frucken with greater fear. In the main battel first began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distressed and driven back, by Quintius the Conful. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most ado. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battel things go better than where he was: caught the enfigns from the enfign bearers, advanced them forward his own felf, yea, and fell to flinging some of them against the thickest of his enemies. For fear therefore of so shameful a disgrace, the fouldiers bestir themselves, and freshly assailed the enemy. And to on all hands alike, they atchieved the victory and won the field. Then came a messenger D from Quintius, & brought word, that he had the better hand, and was now ready to give an affault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter thereinto before he knew for certain, that they in the let point, also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battel. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should joyn his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Conful and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation one to the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish : and so besides the recovery of their own goods again, which they had loft by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their wholearmy. I cannot learn, that either they themselves E required triumph, or the Senate offered them any : and no cause appeareth upon record, why they should either refuse, or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guels in so long distance of times, seeing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Volicians and the Æquians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines war, were denied triumph at the Senats hand; these Contuls might not with modelty, sue for the same; having performed but half the good service of the others; lest if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deserts. But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus atchieved, was obscured and fouly distayned with a shameful doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having A controverly F warred oftentimes one with the other, about some Lands in question between them, and by gi- between the ving and taking fundry foils and overthrows outwearied, chose the people of Rome their Um- Ardeates and pire to decide and determine this quarrel, And when they were come with their counsel to plead ded by the the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Assists of the people. Where was much arguing people of and dispute on both sides before them : and after the witnesses were deposed and that at length Rome. the Tribes should be called to the scrutinie, and the people give their voices, there steps forth an 5, old father one P. Scapius, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) for my part, O Consuls, if it be lawful 3, to speak for the good of the State, wil not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this que-,, flion. When as the Confuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cryed fill that the publick cause of the City was betrayed) to be had G away, he calleth for the affiftance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yeelded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were defirous to hear what the old man could fay, Scaptius should speak his mind at large. Then ferreth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourfcore winters old and three on the head of it and even upon that very ground for which all this firife and variance is, I ferved as a fouldier, when I was no young man neither, but one that had been prefit to given by old wars, and received that had been prefit to Scapius. "wars, and received pay twenty years afore. And it was, I remember well, during the fiege be-"fore Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time,

Worn out clean and forgotten of other men, but fresh in my knowledge and remembrance: to H " wir, that the Lands thus litigious, and in controverly, had been lometime within the confines " of the Coriolans: and alter the winning of Corioli, were feifed by right of conquest, to the Com-" mons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what cultome and prefeription, the · Ardestes and Arkines, who never had right and interest, and were not possessed of the land, 6. (folong as Corieli flood in prosperity) should hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom "being the IL, in fee of the ground, they had cholen for their Arbitrator. As for me, I have whit a small while to live and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but (to that Land, which as old, I being a young and lufty fouldier, did my best to fight for, and " conquered with iword in hand) make claim now that I am aged, by word and mouth, the only I "means leit me to recover it. I advife the people therefore in good fadnefs, that in a vain respect of bootleis modesty, they condemn not their own cause, nor give away their right. The Confuls marking well what audience was given to Scaptius, and that he was heard not only with filen. c. but also with good liking and contentment, tryed out upon this abominable practife: calling both Heaven and Earth to witness, and therewith sent for the Lords of the Councel: and joyning with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and instantly befought them joyning with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and instantly befought them joyning with this most lewd action for the prefent, and a more shameful precedent "ior the time to come: namely, that Umpiers and dayes men, should convert the thing in suic "unto their own and proper vantage: especially considering, that, Admit it were a lawful thing "for a judge himself to have an eye and regard to his own commodity: yet would there not be K 6 fo much gained and gotten by coming thus between, and interverting the Land, as there would "be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by those hard courses, the hearts of their "good friends and Allies. For the loffes (verily) and cracks of name and credit, are such as may "not be valued at any price. And should the Embassadors indeed, say they, go their wayes home with this goodly award: and make report abroad how they have sped? should our confederats "hear this? should our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what grief the one? with "what joy the other? Think ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and affribe "this, unto the speech made by Scapius, a prating old busy body, and one that loveth to hear "himself speak in assemblies? Nay, this is certain: well may Scaptius be famous and much talked " of in the playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome shall incur the obloquy, to have acted L "the part under the vision of Scapius, of a cunning promoter, and a falle interceptor to himself, " of other mens right in suit. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done the like, "as to award the thing in question, unto himself? Why, even Scaptius, past all shame and grace "as he is, would never have done it. These and such like words, spake both Consuls and Senators aloud in a I their hearing. But the coverousness of men, and Scaptiss that first fer them a longing and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were called to the Scrutiny of their voyces, and gave judgment, That the Lands pertained to the common Territory of the people of Ronic. Neither can it be denied, but it would have to appeared indeed, in case it had been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodness of the cause, is not the ignominy of the arb trement one jot the less: Nay, the Aricines and Ardeates themselves, thought not M more shamefully and hardly of it, than the very Senators and Peers of Rome. The rest of the year continued quiet, from all troubles as well domestical as forrain.

THe Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commons, was proposed, and with much ado en. Sted by the Tribuns of the Commonally: notwithstanding, the Nobles withstood it. Tribuns military with full authority of Confuls, were created, Under this kind of Magiltracy was the State ruled for certain years, both in City and in war. The Lands of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were reflored again unto them, and Coloners fent to inhabit the fine. In the time of a great dearth and famine at Rome, one Sp. Melius, a Roman knight, O dealt corn among ft the people freely, at his own proper charges: by which deed he won the favor of the Commons: and the reby affiring to be King, was at the commandment of Quintins Cincinnatus, the D. Stator, flain by the hands of C. Servilius Hala, General of the Horsemen. L. Minutius, who difclosed the treason, had a bullock with guilt horns given him for a reward. The Embassadors of the Romans, which were murdered by the Fidenates, had their Statues or Images erected at the Rofta, or the common Crofs of the City, because they died in the service of the Common-wealth. Cornelius Cossus a Colonil, having flain with his own hand Tolumnius, the King of the Vetentians, wan and bare away the

A second royal spoils. Mamercus Emylius the Distator, limited the Government of the Censureship within the compass of one year and six months, which before that time continued five years: and for that act. was shamefully disgraced by the Censors. Fidene was conquered and subdued, and thither were Coloners fent to dwell. Whom the men of Fidene flew, and revolted from the people of Rome: and by Mamercus Emylins the Dictator were Subdued, and the City forced. The confpiracy of the bondslaves was Suppresfed. Polthumius a Tribure military, was for his cruelty flain by his own fouldiers. The fouldters then first, and never before, budtheir pay out of the common treasury. Moreover, this book containest the wars against the Vosscians and Veientians, the Fidenates and Falisci.

Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Genutius and P. Curiatius. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Canuleius, a Tribune of the Commons, propofed a law, concerning alliance of the Patritians with Commons, by way of mariage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their bloud to be stayned, and the Rights and Priviledges of Families and Houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded to far, that of ten Tribuns that then were, the other C nine propounded this in plain terms for a law, That it might be in the peoples power to chule both the Coss, (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility. Mary, if that should come to pass, the Nobles thought indeed that the soveraign rule and authority, was not only made common with the basest sort, but also translated altogether from the great men and best of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear fay, that the people of Ardia, for the wrongful awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veientians had wasted the Frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volscians and Æquians grudged and muttered for the fortifying of Verrugo; So much preferred they any war, miletable though it were and dangerons, before a shameful and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these news, and taken them in the worlt manner: to the end that amidft the rumour and bruit of fo D many wars, the Tribunitian troublesome suits might stay and be dead for the time: they command musters to be taken, souldiers to be levied, all furniture of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more indeavour, than it had been when T. Quintius was Conful. Then C. Canuleius, after some hot words which he spake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Confuls by frighting the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and that to long as he had any breath in his body, they should never go through with mutter, unless the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forthwith affembled the people together. Thus at one inftant the Consuls animated the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people against the Confuls. "The Confuls gave it out plainly and faid, that no longer now might these furious The allegation E "contries of the Tribuns be enduted. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, one of the Con"and railed more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt) the Tribuns of the "hapned not io much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns the Commons, "more, than of the Confuls. For look what thing was belt rewarded in a City, the same alwayes "most increased: thus men in peace (we see) prove excellent, thus in warthey come to be singu-Lar. In Rome (fay they) feditions fped ever best, and have been reputed both to each one in parciticular and to all ingeneral most honourable. But let the Senare call to mind the dignity which "they themselves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like " to leave to their children: and fee, whether they may boast as the commonalty doth, how that "their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end F." now, nor ever will be, to long as the Authors of feditions be as highly advanced, as the fediti"ons themselves are prosperous and fortunate. See what matters and how great hath Canaleius "attempted! He would bring in a commixture or rather confusion of kindreds and houses, a "perturbation in the managing both of publick and private affairs: that nothing might be fin-" cere and intire, nothing pure and undefiled : that all difference and distinction being taken away, "no man might know either himself or his. For what thing else do these mixtures of states and "degrees by mariages draw after them, without all order and discretion: but that like bruit beatts "in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together? fo that the children between "them born, shall not be able to tell of what blond he is descended, and to what Religion he doth "belong, being a mungrel, as it were, the one half a Noble, the other a Commoner; and not well G "fuiring and according with himfelf? They thought it not enough (be like) that all divine and "humane Laws, were confused and shuffled together: for now these mutinous persons, these busy "heads and troublers of the common people, address themselves to shoot at the Consulship. At "first, they sounded in private speeches and secret discourses, only, how to compass, That one of "the Confuls might be created out of the body of the Commons: but now they go roundly to "work and carry it before them: they are so bold to prefer laws (forfooth) that the people might "make them both either Nobles or Commons, at their good pleasure. Whereby (no doubt) they "would make choise from out of the Commons, of the most seditious persons of all other.

"We shall have then the Canulcians and Icilians to be our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good H "God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or de-"iperate pals: dye they would a thouland deaths rather, than luffer fo great a shame and indignt-"ty: knowing this affuredly, that their ancestours also, if they had once suspected or forleen, "that by granting the commonalty every thing as they defired, they would not have proved "more lovely and chearful towards them, but rather more churlish and untra table: and when "they had obtained their first fuits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after "another: they would fooner have indured at the first, any contesting and debate whatsoever, " than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them : and because they had "once relented, that Tribuns should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time. I "So that as now, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in "one and the leif same City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state " must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better late than never, to withstand " and meet with their rash and delperate boldness. What ? shall they without controlment, first "fow discord at home, and then stir up forrein wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars "which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, forto take arms and defend it self? "and when as they have as good as sent for the enemies to come to their dores, then, not suffer an cr army to be levied against them. But let Canuleius (if he dare) speak these words out in the Se-"nate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror to be admitted and re-"ceived he will flay the mustering? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will sell and K " betray his country, and suffer it to be affailed and lost? What encouragement will such a word " give as that, I say not, to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volscians, Æquians and Veien-"tians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Canulcius, to be able to scale the Capitol and " the Castle, if so be the Tribuns shall take from the Nobility their couragious hearts, as they have "bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that the Confuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the milchie-"vous practifes of their own citizens, before they will make head against the armed forces of their enemies? Whiles these matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Cantleius forthemaintenance of his laws, and to cross the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people, How greatly the Nobles have despised you, O Quirites, how unworthy L of Camulting to they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, the Commons, as often heretofore, so now especially and most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altoagainst the No- gether so fiercely to check and withstand our proposed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we else, but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request mariage; a thing to borderers, yea, and to forrain nations usually granted: and to speak of our " felves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is "far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and chal-" lenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bestow their offices "and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to ser all on an M "uprore, as if Heaven and Earth should go toge her? and what is the cause, that erewhile I had "like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and " fay, they could not forbear nor keep their har ds from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the "facred authority of the Tribuns? Set case that the people of Rome may have their free voyces "and fuffriges, to elect the Confuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so he be "worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the soveraign dignity. How then? cannot this City " possibly stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) " and importeth as much, to disable a Commoner, for being made Consul as if a man inferred, that " a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Per eive you not yet (my Masters) in what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day "light: that ye breath and speak, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they repine, "and it goes to their heart. And what elle? They give it out flatly and fay (if God will) it is un-6 lawful, that a Commoner should be a Coniul. I beseech you hear me a little. If we may not be " allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the High-priests records and registers, know we " not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entred in place of «Kings, and increeded them, and have no other right, preheminence or dignity at all, than Kings whad before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not fomuch as " a citizen of Rome, much less then, a Patritian and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines countrey, and by the peoples voyces, and the affent of the Nobles, created 6. King of Rome? Also, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, no, nor yet so O "much as an Italian, but the fon of Demaratus the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquins, "and from thence removing, albeit King Anem his ions were living, attained likewise to the "(rown? Moreover how Servius Tullius after him, the fon of a captive woman of Corniculum, "whose father was unknown, whose mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained "and held the Kingdom? For what should I speak of 7. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus him-"felf, the father and founder of this City, admitted to raigntogether with him? Well, so long as " no flock was distained, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparks of vertue, the Romans Em-

A "pire became mighty, and flourished. Scorn ye then at this day, a Consul out of the Commo-" nalty, when our forefathers despited not Kings that were aliens and strangers? No, nor when "the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and thut against forreiners, that were valorous, and men of action. The kinred and whole name (I am fure) of the Claudii, after the Kings were " exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but also received into the "number of the Patritians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Noble-"man, and so a Consul? And shall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly disa-"bled and out of all hope for ever of being Comin!? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not possible, that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, B "may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius? and it hedo whether shall we suffer "him to govern the Common-weal, or no? And whether will ye have our Confuls, such rather "as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the sun, who, by your leave, "were at that time of the Nobility) than strangers and new-commers, which of all the Kings " were simply the very best? But for looth, presently after the KK, were deposed and expelied, "there was not one of the Com, a Conful. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, "and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practiled, "(as ina state newly incorporate) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expe-"dient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Augurs: by Numa Pompilius they "were created. There was no Seffing of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds and Classes. By S. Tullius they were instituted. Cost, were never heard of before: when the KK. "were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the absolute rule nor yet the "name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers dayes it first began. Tribuns, Ædiles, Questors "there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have "both created and also abolished out of the common-weal, Decemvirs for the making and pen-"ning of our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and increasing " still infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Priest-hoods and sacerdotal "dignities, new priviledges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in " question, to wit, that the Com. and Nobles might not joyn in marriage, were not the Decem-"virs they that first within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful ensample and pre-D "cedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any "greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as "defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What elie is this, but to suffer " exile and confining within the same walls, when they debar us that we should not be either al-" lied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forfooth) and take order that bloud should "not be mixed, not families confused. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours, " which most of you descended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Pa-"tritians, but by coptation and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by "the favour and grace of the Kings, or elfe by the peoples voyces after the KK, were expelled: "could not your wifedoms have kept your bloud uncorrupt by some private means and provisi-"on, namely, by taking heed neither to espouse wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer " your daughters and fifters to be married to any other than Nobles? Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly indeed reported) O ye Consuls, the Commons are ready prefit to follow you : provided alwayes, "that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that I "they may be linked, joyned and united unto you, by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and " valiant men may have hope and polibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed " fellowship and society in the Common-weal: Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty) "they may one with another in alternative course, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed again in their turns. If any of you shall gainfay and withstand these conditions, prace still and talk at "your pleafure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will; There is not "one shall give his name, not one shall take arms, not one shall fight for those proud Lords, with whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-weal, nor alliance of many "riage in private estate. Now when as the Confuls also were come forth into the open assembly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations, to short dispute K and altercation: the Tribun demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Confulfhip? Linto whom the Conful returned an aniwer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present contention not very wifely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the An-fpices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, lest upon a doubtful and mingled issue, thereshould follow a troubled consusion of the Auspices. But hereat, the Commons stormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never gave they over their hears of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a most sharp Tribun to set them awork and were themselves in obstinacy no whit behind him Juntill at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage L should pais: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give over their suit for making commoners Consuls, or at least wife put it off, until the war were ended: and that the Commons in the mean while being well pleased and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a muster. Canulcius for this his victory over the Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Commons, became a great and mighty man, Whereupon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combate: and for the proceeding of their Law allo, indeavoured with all their might and main. And albeit the rumour of the war encreased daily more and more, yet they hinder the levy of fouldiers. The Confuls feeing now that no decree and order could pass the Senate-house, by reason that the Tribuns interposed their negative voyce: took counce together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well M they law that they must yeeld either the victory to their enemies, or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had been Coss. only Valerius and Horatius were not present at thete couniels. C. Claudise his opinion was, That the Confuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribuns: Butthe two Quinti, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all bloudshed and violent proceedings against those, whom by a solemn covenant made with the Commons, they had received and accepted for to be as facrolain and unviolable. But in these counsels they grew to this point in the end, that they infered military Tribuns of equal power with the Confuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided alwayes, that as touching creation of the Confuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner aforetime, And herewith were both Tribuns and Commons well fatisfied and contented. A general N assembly therefore was proclaimed for the chusing of three Tribuns in Consuls authority, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought tending to sedition, and above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their whited robes to take hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first, the Nobles partly in despair of obtaining the place (leeing the Commons so set a flote) partly for disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of so base condition, were scared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heads and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and suiters for the dignity: left they might feem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-weal, and leave it entirely for the Commons. The event and effect of this Court, shewed O plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aright without passion and affection. For the people fatisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all of the Nobles. This modelly, this equity, this noble mind where shall a man now adayes find in one person, which then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundreth and tenth year after the City of Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the

A Confuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Aratinus, L. Attilius, and C. Cecilius: in whole government, con-Military T.i. cord at home caused also peace abroad. There be writers who affirm, That upon occasion of the buns first Veientian war, and the rebellion of the Ardeats, because two Consuls were not able to manage created, with fo many wars at once, therefore were three military Tribuns chosen: without making any mention of the Law published, concerning election of Confuls of the Commons: and that they were in effed both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Consuls. Howbeit, the exercife of that government, stood not fast and fure, nor continued long. For within three moneths after that they entred, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been tome error intheir creation. It was alledged that C. Curiatius, who was Prefident of that Court B of Election, had taken his quarters amils for the observation of the lucky figns by flight of birds. and not according to the Augurs skill,

There came from the Ardeats to Rome, Embaffadors, complaining of wrong received, in these terms: That if it might be redressed, and amends made, and their grounds restored, they seemed willing to abide fill in league and amity. Answer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people, already passed, could not be reversed by the Senate, if it were so nothing else but for concord take and agreement of the States: befides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeats would wait their times, and put to the Senates arbitrement and differetion, the redress and easement of their injury pretended, it would come to pals, that in process of time they should not repent of governing C their passions, and bridling their choler: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, that there should no wrong be offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered, it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors, promiting, to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was : were friendly dismissed, and had their discharge.

The Senators feeing now the Commonweal, without any foveraign Magistrate of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they strove whether Consuls or Tribuns should be created, the Interregent continued many dayes. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Consuls: the Tribuns on the other side, and their Commonalty, were for the Tribuns Conjular. But the Senators prevailed, because both the people feeing they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, furceased to strive any D more: and also the chief of the Commons, chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be once propounded, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthy, The Tribuns also gave over to contend any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratify and pleasure the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quintius Barbatus the Interregent, chole for Confuls L. Papprius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Atratius. Whiles these mere Confuls, the league with the Ardeats was renued. And this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Consuls that year, for that neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calenders of the Magistrates, they are found at all. I take it, because the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although these Consuls were in their stead chosen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year.

Licinius Macer affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeats, and also in the linen books or registers in the Church of Jano Moneta. Albeit there had been so many terrors and bravados, threatned from the borderers, yet borh abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Confuls also chosen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year; certain it is, that the next following, had Confuls M. Geganius Macerinus the second time, and T. Quintius. Capitolinus the fift time. This was the very year when the Cenfors office came up first. A thing that role of a small beginning: which notwithstanding asterwards increased to that height, that it had government, of the manners and discipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the diffinction of worship and shameful disgrace, were reduced. Likewise, the survey of publick and private Ædifices, F yea, and the tributes, revenues and inbidies of the people of Rome were at the dipolition, ordering, and difference of this office. The beginning of which thing arole upon this occasion: For that the people in many years space had not been assessed and numbred, and seeing the Cense could be deferred no longer, nor the Confuls (by reason of wars, from so, many nations imminent) had leifure to go about and accomplish that bufiness: the Senate therefore made a motion, that the charge being painful, and not for the Majefty of Confuls to buly themselves in, required a special Magistrate, and a peculiar officer by it self. Under whom should attend the Secretaries and Clerks: who likewife should have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whose discretion should pass the scedules and instruments of all Assesments. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there G should be the more Magistrates of the Nobility. Supposing (I ween) it would come to paste, as (it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win more authority and credit unto the thing. Yea. and the Tribuns also made no great ado, but suffered it to pass, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessity and attendance, than of shew. port, or honor: because they would not seem to be cross and peevish in every small matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principal of the City refused, the people by their voyces chose to that Office. Papyrius and Sempronius, of whose Confulfhip there was some doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supply and make up created.

Cenfors hift the defect and miss of a Confulship. And of the exercise and function it self, Cenfors were they H

Whiles these things were a doing at Rome, there came Embassadors from Ardea, craving as wel in regard of their most ancient amity, as also of the late league renued their helping hand for their City, welnigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which witely and by right good advite they had kept and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reason of inward debate and domestical quarrels. The cause and beginning whereof, as it is reported, arose from fiding and factions, which have been and will be to most states more pernicious, than forrain wars, than famine or plane, or other adversities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremity of all publick calamicies what loever. There was a maid, a Commoners daughter and no better, by buth, but for her rare beauty of fingular note and passing renown: whom two young men were futters unto. The one of the same condition or estate that the maid was of, and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who allo were of that degree and calling: the other a Gentleman, enamoured on her, only for her beauty. As for him, he had the good wills of the best in the City, by whose means the strike of partaking, entred even into the house of the Damosel. For the Gentleman in the Mothers judgment, was the more welcome and better liked of, whose desire was, that the maid should be preferred by marriage, and be most worshipfully bestowed. The Guardians also banded themselves, and laboured for their party. But when as the matter might not be ended within dores, it came to fuit in Law. And when the reasons and allegations were heard, both of the Mother, and allo of the Guardians, the Judges pronoun- K ced sentence of marriage to be at the disposition of the Mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforefaid, openly in the market place of the City, having amongst those of their party and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troup of men by force, fet the maid out of the Mothers house. Against whom arose a stronger power of the gentry, and following the young Gentleman, who was incenfed and fet on fire upon this injury offered. Whereupon infued a cruel fray. The Commons being defeated, went forth (far unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the City, and took for their hold a Hill, and invaded the Lands of the Nobles with fire and fword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artifans and handicrafts men, whom in hope of spoilthey had called forth, they purpose and prepare to beliege the City allo, which aforetime had been altogether unacquainted with the like I ftorms. In fuch fort, as no kind of calamity that followeth war, was wanting : as if the poor City had been tainted, infected, and poisoned with the futious madness of two brain-sick young men, feeking a woful and deadly marriage, with the utter ruin and destruction of their native Country. And neither part thought it enough to war and fight at home among themselves, For the Nobles folicited the Romans for to rescue their besieged City: the Commons stirred up the Volicians, to help to force and fack the City. The Volicians under the conduct of Aquus Cluitus came first to Ardea, and against the walls of their enemies, raised a countermure, and cast a trench, and blocked the Town round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome, forthwith M. Geganius Conful, went forth with an army, and incamped himself three miles from the enemies: and the day being now far fpent and drawing toward night, he commandeth his fouldiers to refresh and make much M of themselves, and take their rest: and afterwards at the relief of the fourth watch, he brought forth his enfigns, fethis men to work, and fped his bufiness once begun, so that by the sun-rising, the Volicians might see themselves invested more streightly by the Romans, then the City beleaguered by them. And on another side the Consul had joyned a sconce to the wall of Ardea, by which way his fouldiers might go and come in fafety. The Captain of the Volicians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but suitained his army only with the corn which he had for the present from day to day robbed by forraging the Country, seeing himself intrenched, and of a judden to be destitute of all things, called the Consulforth to emparle, saying, That if the Romans coming was to raise the siege, he would remove and dislodge from thence. To which again the Conful made this reply, That vanquished men were to take, and not to make Articles of Condi-N tions : neither should they, as they were come at their pleasure to assault the allies of the Romans, to depart again when they lift to Volfer. He commandeth therefore to yeeld their General, to lay down their weapons, confessing themselves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwise he would be a bitter and mortal enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried [til, and carry home to Rome the victory of the Volscians, rather than their faithless peace. The Volscians, when they had affayed that small hope they had in their weapons (for all hope else was cut off) besides all other things that were crofs unto them, encountred in a place of great disadvantage for fight, but worfe for flight: and feeing themselves on every side beaten down and slain, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their Captain, yeelded their weapons, were driven under the Gallows, and in their fingle doublet and hofe with great shame and calamity, were let go and sent O away. And fitting them down to rest themselves, not far from the Town Tusculum, the Tusculans upon an oldgrudge and hatred against them fer upon them thus disarmed and naked as they were at unawares, and were so meet with them, that scarcely there remained any one to carry news of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Roman Col, appealed the troubles at Ardea: beheaded the chief Captains of that commotion, and confilcated their goods to the common chieft and Chamber of the Ardeats. And to by this great favour and benefit of the people of Rame, they supposed the injury of the former arbitrement was done away and recompensed. Bur yet

A the Senat of Rome, thought somewhat behind ftill for the cancelling of the memorial of publick avarice. The Conful returned, triumphing into the City, leading Cluitus the Captain of the Vol. See the end of fcians before his chariot, with the spoil born afore him of the enemies, whom he had disarmed, me former and brought under the yoak. Quintius the Conful again for his part, in his long robe and gown Book. ofpeace, countervailed (a thing not usually icen) the glory of his Colleague in his bright armor: who had so great regard at home to entertain concord and peace among the Citizens, by minifiring justice indifferently, as wel to the highest as to the lowest, that the senators reputed him a severe Conful, and the Commons accounted him as meck and gentle a person. And more he won at the Tribuns hands by countenance and reputation, than by contention and debate. His

B five Confulthips wherein he carried himself after one and the self fame manner and order: the course of his whole life, ever Contul-like, caused his person to be in a manner more reverenced then his honourable place. By this means, whiles these were Consuls, no words were made of military Tribuns. Then created they for Confuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Posthumius Ebutins Cornicen. These Consuls, by how much greater and more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were atchieued by those, whom they saw they were to succeed (and surely that year was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, because the Ardeats in fo hard diffres, were by them succoured for much the more earnestly endeavoured for their part, to raze out of mens minds the infamy of that judgement aforesaid, and made an Act and Decree of the Senat in this form, That for as much as the City of the Ardeats, by reason of Civil

Ctroubles, was dispeopled and brought to a small number of Citizens, there should be enrolled certain inhabitants to be fent thither for a Garrison, and defence against the Volscians. This was openly ingroffed in publick Tables, and Infruments, for a policy, that their fecret intent and purpose of reverting and disanulling the arbitrement, might not be perceived by the Tribuns and the Commons. But they closely complotted, that when they had enrolled a lar greater number of Rutilians than of Romans, for to inhabit Ardea, neither should any other lands be divided, but those which by that infamous and unhonest award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clod of ground should be affigned to any other Roman, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutilians. Thus the domain that had been in question, returned again to the Ardeats. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Golony to Ardea, were created theie, Agrippa Menenius, T. D. Clalius Siculus, and M. Ebnius Helua, Who, befides that, they offended the Commons by their ready fervice and nothing popular, in regard, that they affigned and fet out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their own, were not well thought of neither, by the chief of the Nobility : because in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accused by the Tribuns before the people.) For when they had registred and placed the Coloners, they remained fill themselves in the same Colony, which they had as witness of their innocency, and just dealing.

In this year, and the year following, when Caius Furius Pacilius, and Marcus Papirius Crassus were Confuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the De-E cemvirs, according to the Senats decree, during the time of the Commons infurrection and departure from the Nobles, were this year fet forth, Petilius fought for some occasion of sedition, but in vain. Who being made Tribun the fecond time, albeithe harped fil upon one firing, and threatned the self same things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Consuls should propole unto the Senat, concerning the division of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senators should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Confuls or Tribuns (Confular) determined it was at length, that Confuls should be chosen. So, that the menaces of the Tribun, that he would hinder the muster, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borderers were at quiet, there was no need either of war or preparation for war. After this great quietness of the State, Fiolloweth a year (wherein Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Confuls) for fundry calamities and perils memorable: namely, Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoak of Kings rule again and that, by the sweetness of a Largels. There wanted only forraign war: wherewith if the Common-weal had been afflicted too, hardly could the help of all the gods above, have recovered the State. These calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unfeasonable for corn, or that they were so in love with the plausible and seditious Orations, and of the City it self, that they slighted and neglected the Tillage of their ground, it is uncertain. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight. one while upon the fraud and naughtiness, another while upon the negligence and remis-G nels of the Confuls. At the last the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not against the will of the Senate) to chuse L. Minutim Master of the provision or principal purveior of corn and victuals: a man who in that office proved more lucky to preserve the liberty of the City then happy in the exercise or ministery of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he deserved and had, both praise and thanks, for bringing down the price of Corn. Who, notwithstanding many Embaffages fent both by fea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpose (ut that out of Hetruria there was brought some little sprinkling of Corn) nothing eased and mended the Market and therefore he turned again to the dispensing or dealing the present dearth

indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what com he had, to open his garnets, H to bring it forth, to vent and sell that, which hehad more then would serve a month, But when by this practife, and by defrauding servants a portion of their dayly food, and by accusing the corn-mungers and exposing them to the surious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courles and sharp inquisitions rather laid open then eased the present need and necessity: many of the common people despairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus milerably tormented, pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlong into Tyber, Then Sp. Melius, by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in tholedays) exceeding rich, enterprised a thing, commodious I must needs say, but a dishonest precedent of dangerous consequence, and proceeding of a worse mind and intent of his. For having with his own I mony bought up the corn out of Hetraria by the means of his friends and vaffals, whose minifiry he used: which thing (I believe verily) was an hindrance that all the publick care and providence, took finall effect, and nothing helped the general want and scarcity, he devised to bring up a free dole and distribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way soever he went carrying a port and majefly with him above the degree of a private person, draw after him a train of the people, promiting him by their favour of upport, undoubted and affured hope of a Confulthip. But himself (as mans nature is unsatiable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters then fortune promised him, and those unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Consulfnip was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wills, he plotted to make himself a K King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for fo deep reaches and defigns, and worthy that great contention and strife which he was to abide with much toil and sweat of brows. Now drew the Election on apace for Confuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devices to full ripeness and persection. Consul was created L. Quintius Capitolinus the fixth time, a man most unfit for his turn, that should go about innovations and to change the state and with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, surnamed Lanatus. And L. Minutius, was either made again the master victualler, or else created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the case should require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Corn-master, recorded both years in the linnen Books or Registers among other Magistrates. This Minutius was vigilant, and as careful for the Common-weal, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon oc- L casion that men of the same quality, to wir, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely, in his own and in the house of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their means, of Melius his treason: and declared unto the Senat the whole complot, Namely, That there was armor and weapons good flore, carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventicles there, and made seditious Orations, and that it was past all peradventure that he practised to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon. Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to sell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excused himself (and said) That because he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat M with the latest, and later well-neer, then might stand with the common safety of the Weal-publick, Which news after they were heard, and that on every fide the chief Senators had given both the Coss, of the former year a check, for that they had suffered those Largesses of corn, and tollerated meetings of the Commons in a private house: and rebuked the new Consuls also, for that they had flayed so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the corn-mailer detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Cof. to be not only the informer, but also the reformer: Then T. Quintius answered, That the Consuls wereblamed without just cause, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, tending to the great prejudice and dilanulling of their foveraign government, had not commission sufficient by vertue of their place, to punish the thing according to the hainouinesse and quality thereos, as they had courage and heart thereto: N and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and front man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none, And therefore he would name L, Quintins for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authority. When all men liked wel therof Quinties himself at the first refused : demanding what they meant, to object and expose him, an unweldy mane to far flept in years, to fo great trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alledged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy then in all men befides; heaping on him right due and deferved praises, and commendations; and whiles the Conful also importuned him fill and gave not over : then Cincinnatus, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in fo fearful a case, might not turn either to the losse or dishonor of the Common wealth, was by O the Consul pronounced Distator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala General of the horsemen. The morrow after when he had set and disposed certain guards, in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place: the common people wondring at the frangeneffe of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himself their Captain, saw well that the force and power of this so great a magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and designs that tended to the seiting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or sudden war, should require either a Dictarors of the City. With that, Servilius the General of the horiemen was by the Dictator fent to Melius: Who faid unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Whereat he being alraid. asked again, What he would? and Serviling faid, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minusus had informed against him, before the Senat. Then Melius began to retire himselse back into the rout of his followers, and looking about at the first, thrunk only away from him, and retuled to obey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemens commandment, began to force him to go with him : but he being refoued by the flanders by, found his feet and began to fly, and befought the aid of the Com-B monalty of Rome: faying, That the faction of the Nobles con pired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality beflowed upon them: beteeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to juffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very fight. As he toake these words, Hila Servilius overtook him, and killed him out-right: and being sprinkled with his blood thus flain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he bringerh word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to come unto him, put back the Apparitor, and raised the multitude: and now had suffered due punishments for his deserts. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valor and vertue of thine, O.C. Servilius, thou deservest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny. Then C as the multitude murinured and made a fir upon some doubt, what they should think of thefact, and what might be the occasion thereof; he commanded them to assemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was juffly flain: yea, albeit he had been cleer from seeking to be King: for that being summoned and convented before the Dictator, and that by the General of the horsemen, he refused and came vented before the Dictator, and that by the General of the noriemen, ne retuied and came not: "for my fell (quoth he) was fer judicially to examine and enquire of the caule: and of Quintins "upon the trial thereof, Melius should have sped no worse then his cause deserved: but the Dictator, "because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment, by violence to the people "therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be protected against as a Citizen, who of Rome. fervice farre from home, and trufting withal in their own selves, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out

Ifind, that this Minutus forlook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken H in to be the eleventh Tribun of the Commons, and appealed the mutiny that arole upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribuns to be encreased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the commonalty would not keep it ftill, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwife attempt it again. But above all, this confuteth and reproveth the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute exptelly provided, That Tribuns might not chuse and take unto them a Colleague in office. Q. Cecilius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Colledge of Tribuns that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minntius, but rather accused f unto the Commons, both Minutius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Melius: and in fine prevailed to much, that there should be an election for military Tribuns rather then for Confuls: nothing doubting, but if fix were chofen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons alto, by promising to revenge the death of Melins, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were colled that year with many and fundry troubles, choic no more then three Tribuns with Confuls authority; and among them, L. Quintius the fon of Cincinnatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship patt, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamercus Emplius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the K third. Whiles these bare soveraign rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lars Telumnius murdereth the Roman Emballadors. Tolumnius, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed. For at the commandment of Tolumnius, they flew C. Fulcinius, and C. Julius, Sp. Nausus, and L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a lucky cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidenatians so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadours to bekilled, and that (forfooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embaffadours (a thing incredible, that at the comming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, L who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is; that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being attains with the guiltinesse of so soul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Roftra. [A publick croffe (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, out of which the Magistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beak heads of ships and their brasen pikes called Rostra.] Thus was therelike to be a cruel constitut with the Veientians, and Fidenates, M Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the commonpeople and their Tribuns, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Geganius Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (namad (I suppose) so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this manfirst encountred with the King of the Veientians on this fide * Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own souldiers, then the joint or the discomfiture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrents, ordained Mamercus Emplius to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of N Tribuns military in Confuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, who had been a Tribun with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy fon of fo worthy a father. To appose fouldiers that were by the Conful mustered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriers, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Dicator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewife nothing thereto inferiour, drave the enemies out of the Roman ground, and fet them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp fill backward, feized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Le-O gions of the Falifei came to fuccour. Then at length, the Tulcans encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise rested and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trench and rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and fet them in order of battel. The ene-

the war on length. Tolumnius, albeit the advice of his own men liked him better, yet because the Faliscians should not endure lingring warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battel against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies for the present shifted off fight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the fouldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unlesse they might have battel, they would affault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both patts cameforth R into the midft of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certain companies to setch a compass behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should set upon the Roman Camp. And in this order flood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veientians kept the right point, the Faliscians the lest, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Di-Chator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and on the lest Capitolinus Quintius charged the Veientians: and against the main battel between both, marched the Coronel of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horse. Thus as they stood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there filence on either fide, and all quiet. For neither would the Tuicans begin first, unlesse they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and C anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Augurs should set up a signal alost (as it was agreed between them) fo foon as the flight of fowls gat eapprobation accordingly: which he no fooner espied, but he put out presently the men of arms, with a great shour against the enemies. The army of the footmen followed hard after in the tail, and seconded them with a lufty charge. But on no hand were the Tuscan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hardest to it, and made head still. For the King himselfe, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, when as on every fide his enemies charged and preffed fore upon him, rode afront them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among the Roman horiemen, a Tribune or Mar-fhal, one A. Corneline Coffus, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and strong with Dal, who let before his eyes the noble house from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his ancestors left him, so to recommend the same to his posterity more glorious and renowned. This man seeing the troops of Romans waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tolumnius, which way foever he bent and turned; and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. " Is this (quoth he) the for worn breaker of "humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now "will I prefently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world should remain wholly and "inviolate, be his Prieft, I will facrifice and betake him to the ghosts of our Embassadors "deceased. Herewith, setting spurs to his horse, with bent spear in rest, he rode full a-E gainst that one enemy, fingled from the rest; smote him, and dismounted him from his horse. Then bearing upon his staff, alight presently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the bols of his target, and laid him firetching long & after many wounds given him, at length fastned him with his spear to the very ground, And when as he was once dead, he disarmed and dispoiled him, and struck off his head and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King flain, and to discomfitted them. Thus was the strength of the horsemen deseated also, which only had made the battel doubtful, The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmen to flight, pursued them (till, and drave them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chafe. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coasts of the Country, fled into the F mountains, and escaped. Coffus with his horsemen passed over Tyber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientians. As this battel was in fighting, there was a skirmish also in the Roman camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforesaid) was sent by Tolumnius to surprise it. Fabius Vibulanus first defended the rampart, ordering his men all within, in compass like a garland: and while the enemies were wholly bent about the affault, he with the Triarii or fouldiers of the rereward, suddenly issued forth at the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave at hot charge upon them; Upon which they were affrighted, but there enfued the less flaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lesse in disarray, than those in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prosperous success every where, returned with triumph into the City, by

G the decree of the Senat, and grant of the people. In which triumphs the greatest shew and goodlieft fight of all, was Coffus, bearing the rich & royal spoils of the King, slain by his own hand. For of him the fouldiers chanted divers rude ballads without rime and metre, comparing him in their fongs with Romalus. Which spoils with a solemn manner of dedication, he bestowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, neer unto those of Romulus, which were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went he with- H drew from the Dictators charior, the eyes of all the people unto hineles, and hee in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that teftival day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one * pound weight, raifed out of the common money of the

* 36. lib.fterl. in angel gold.

Thus have I fet down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Coffus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Fereiviss, the second royal spoils. Howbert, over and bendes, that those spoils onely are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none I for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title allo written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [That Cossus being Consul, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Angustus Cosar himsels, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entred into the house of Inpiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linnen Jack or Curaze: I thought it little better then sacriledge, to differential and cancel the refilmony of Coffin himself concerning his own spoils, and of Anguftus Cafar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That fo ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linnen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Macer Licinius doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Coffus, the seventh year after Conful, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his own fense, and have his opinion by himself treely. For more then all this may be alledged to prove, that so famous a battel could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Confullinp of Coffus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of petilence and dearth of corn fo as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing burthe bare names of the Consuls. In the third year, after that Coffus was Conful, he was military Tribun in Confuls authority, and in the lame year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battel with horiemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and gueffe what howill, L But (as I think) we may tofs these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battel his own felfe, having fet up these fresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselfe standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despied nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Con-

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientians Country, and the other into the Falifcians, andbooties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, not any battel was M fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not affaulted, because the people at home died of the pettilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons fought occafions and pretences to move feditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevaile and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falfely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these surmiles were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the fickness ftill encreasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the N Country were by many earthquakes cast down, Whereupon the people went in solema procession and made their supplications, whiles the Dummin going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people said after him wordfor word. But the year following, when C. Italint the second time, and L. Virgimus were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none let forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entred now into the lands about Rome, and forraged all the Country, After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Falisti-O ans could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their enfigns. So the fear was no lesse within the City than in the Country. Then Inline the Conful bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and

A the walls: whiles Virginius affembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinnes, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, furnamed (as some lay) Priscus, or as other, Structus. Virginius making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Posthumius Ebutius Helna. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and lo many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Entigns were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whiles these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds and B and places of advantage; and thither marched the Dictator with his army in order of battel. And encountring with them not far from Nomentum, he discomfitted the legions of the Tulcans, and drave them into the town of Pidene, and call a trench about it. But neither could the town be scaled for the high site thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay fiege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men beneged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by affault, and also of forcing them to yeeld by composition, purposed incertain places for the neernesse to him well known, at the backfide of the City which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural fituation the furelt, to undermin unto the Castle. And he him, Fidene won by C fell in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army die a Stratageme vided into four parts, to succeed one another by turns in order: and so, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all per civing and intelligence of the work under ground to until such time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Castle. And when as the Tuscans were wholly amused upon the vain threatnings, and bravado's of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood; behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an out-cry, that the town was taken. In this year Cn. Furius Pacilins and M. Geganus Maccrinus, Ceniots, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field : and there first by them was Villa Publica. held the Seffing and numbring of the people. I find in Macer Licinius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Amias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius for the Confuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tubero and Macer professe that they followed the linnen Records: and neither of them both conceal that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribuns military, in Confuls authority. Licinius without doubt is addicted to those limen Regulters, and Tubero is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Hetranian Whilest not only the Veign-E tians were scared, learing the like destructions but the Falifei also, remembring the war A General Discourse of the Control o began first with them, albeit they were not affistant in their rebellion. When as therefore et of all Tulbegan first with them, albeit they were not affiltant in their rebellion, which as theretogy canic at Fahum these two States had sent their Embassadours abroad to the twelve. Civies about them, and Polumna, obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Heiruria should be assembled at the Temple of Viterboat * Votanga: the Senar, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought this day, as it good that Mamerous Emplius, should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, is thought. A. Post burnius Tubero was named General of the horsemen. And with so much greater endeavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war, afore, by how much more danger there was from all Herraria banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this bulinels was much more quiet than all men looked for. When p as thereforenews came by Merchants, that the Veientiana were flatly denied help, and biddento end that war by their own means, and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: not feek to embark them in the affociation of their milery and advertity, unto whom they had not imparted their mind & hope in their upright flare, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not feem to be created in vain, seeing, all matter of a contring renown by war was cut off, defirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, letteth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not so much with the greatness of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore The Oration affembled all the people together: "For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have under- of Mamereus G" raken to govern the Common Weale abroad, and performed all fate and fure: I for my pret Amet us, to the "concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and pro-"vide for the freedom of the people of Rome. "for other magistracies they are from year to year: but this of the Cenfors continuing five H " years, is very heavy and grievous. And hard it is for men to live fo many years, even a " great part of their life, in danger of the same Rulers still. Minded therefore I am, to propole a law, That the Cenforship continue no longer than one year and six months. With great applaule and consent of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (quoth he) O Quirites, know in very deed, how I mislike of these long lasting offices, here presently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus havinggiven over his ownplace, fer a limitation to the rule of others, and absolutly ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his houle. The Cenfors taking it grievoully that Mamercus had abridged an office of the people I of Rome, displaced him from his own Tribe, laying on him an eightfold tax in the subsidy Book, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better then a Tributary. Which dilgrace (they say) he took with a noble stomack, looking rather to the cause of this shameful note, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the cnuea and made Ararius. Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Cenforship nails should be pared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of thole in place: for as much as they all faw plainly, that they should be both longer time and oftener under Censors, then Censors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereos, that by the authority of no man but of Mamerem himselse, could they be restrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tri- K buns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Confuls. When as the matter was well neer brought to the point of an Interreign, they obtained at length with much strife and contention, that there should be mili-Tibuns Mili- tary Tribuns cholen, with Confular authority. But reward of this their victory, whereat they shot, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Folius, and L.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietness from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great loss was there both in town and country, by the the mortality of men and murrain of cattel, one with another L indifferently. And fearing left the hisbandmen of the country should be familhed, they fent for corninto Herraria and the country of Pomptinum, to Cumes, and at last even into Si-cily. And not a word all this while about the election of Consuls. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Consuls authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the ficknefle abated : neither was there any danger or fear of scarcity of Corn, because they had made provision aforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the general Diets of the Volscians and Equians, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumnia about making war, There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held:notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Veii, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the State. In this mean season, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but fill in vain, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained fecret Counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in fo many yeares, There were Tribunes Military created with Confuls authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonalty advanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (fay they) ingreat wisedom and deep fore N cast, haue done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have access to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odious are we become to those of our own coat, and are as little fet by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators : by whole ambition, by whole crafty fetches and fubril policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any respit or breathing time, and not be follicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and soveraign type of authority. For O the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and refolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he fued for any dignity. A smal matter now adayes, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious counsel, and themselves and those of their own salling, in giving of their voices and having once gotten affiliance into them, would also win the highest pitch and soveraign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices they agree and rot the Tribuns should preser and publish a law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or retresh the bright thee of his upper garment, while he wed for any mounts. A simali matter now adays and may seem sarcely worth the debating in serious countel, which notwithstanding at that time, set both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns so much, that this law passed: and it appeared. B that the Commons when their blood was once up, would affect their own, and wholly incline to them in their suffrages. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and put it in practice, an Act of the Senate was, that there should be held an Election of Confuls. The occasion thereof, was a tumult or commotion: which, as the Latins and Hernicks advertised them, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintius Cincinnatus, the fon of Lucius (surnamed lo Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Consuls. Neither was this seafful news of war entertained any longer. For the enemies having by a sacred law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levy an army) mustered their power, fet forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Aquians and Volscians, severally by themselves encamped strongly, and more earnestly C studied the Captains to fortifie their camps, and to train and exercise their souldiers. than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful that the messengers brought to Rome, So the Senate agreed to create a Distator. For, although those nations oftentimes had been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Also, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans was fore diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Confuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their counsel terrified them most. There be that write, how these Consuls had but unlucky fortune, and lost a field in Algidum: and that it should be the cause of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that how loever else the Consuls disagreed, yet they jumped in one to cross the wills of the D Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until fuch time as after news brought, still worse and worse, and yet the Consuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quinthis Servilius Prifest, a man, who right worthy and honourably had born the highest offices, made this speech: "My Masters, ye that are Tribuns of the Commons (quoth he) in this The speech of "exigent and desperate case, the Senate calleth for your assistance, that in so great hazzard & servilin "of the Common-weal, ye by vertue of your authority, would force the Confuls peremp- Prifeus. "torily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard; the Tribuns supposing now they had good occasion offered, to stretch and extend their power to the sull, departed a-side: and in the name of their Colledge or society, pronounced, That it was their pleasure and will, that the Confuls should be obedient unto the Senat: and in case they proceeded to E do farther, then the conient of that most honourable House would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Confuls chose rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senat: faying yet withal, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Consulship made thrall and subject to the Tribuns power, if so be the Confuls might be compelled to do ought by vigour of the Tribuns authority, and (than which, a private person could fear no more) be sent also to ward, or committed to prison. The lot fell to T. Quintius (for in this also they could not agree between themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Posthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of most severe and stern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry: Herewithal was proclamed a vacation or law-steed, and that through-Four the whole City they should go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of fuch as pretended to be freed and exempt from fouldiery, was put off until the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtful, suffered themselves to be enrolled; and souldiers were levied out from the Hernicks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Distator having left C. Julius the Conful, for the defence of the City, & L. Julius the General of the horsemen for all fudden occasions incident unto wars, that they might not be to feek for any thing whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Aulus Cornelius the High Priest, & saying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and stately playes, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome war : and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole other, fo they also, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themselves: the Dictator neer to Tusculum, and the Consul to Lanuvium. So these four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plain in the middle, sufficient not only for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the time that they lay

G army between himself and Quintins the Cos. at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had dif overed the two camps of their enemies, a little space diftant one from an-encamped encamped one against another, they ceased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator H was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their firength and pullance with their enemies, and assaying by little and little to try the event of these skitmishes, should conceive aforehand some hope of the entite and general victory.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battel, asfailed by night the Confuls camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful iffue. The indden cry and alarm, awakned not only the Confuls, Sentinels, his corps de guard, and so his whole army, but the Dictator also out of their sleep. And where need was of present help, there failed not the Conful, either in courage or counsel. Some fouldiers ward and delend the gates, others compais the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dicta- I tor, look how much less stir there was, so much moreleasure had they, and studied what was most needful to be done. Forthwith aid was fent unto the Conful his camp, under the leading of Sp. Pifthumius Albus, a Lieutenant. The Dictator himself in person, with part of his power, fetching a small compass about, gained a place most apart from all noise and tumult, and from whence at unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegrent in the leaguer Q. Sulpitim: and to M. Pabin; a Lieutenant, he committeth the condust of the horsemen, commanding him not before day to sir with his horse, as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things elfe, that a provident and industrious Captain in such a case might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the reft, he shewed fingular K proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praise: in that he sent out first M. Geganim with certain chosen Squadrons to assail that camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his espials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he surprited the enemies there, amused wholly upon the event of other mens danger, carelesse and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their scouts and guards; wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was affailed. From whence the Dictator having descried a smoak (which was the signal agreed between them) crieth aloud, that the enemies camp was won, and commandeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all was clearly to be seen: by which time both Fabius with the horsemen, had given the charge, and the Consul also had made a fally out of the camp, up- L on the enemies that now already were scared. But the Dictator on the other side, charging upon the rereward and the middle battel, came on every fide with his footmen, and horsemen in train of victory against the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way, according to the diffonant outcries, and judden alarms. Thus being environed round about, they had in the midft died for it every one, and fuffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Vettius Messius, one of the Volicians, a man more renowned for his valiants acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a loud voice his fellows, being ready now to cast themselves into rings, and said: "What? will ye here without making your deof Vellius Mef- fence, without revenge, offer your selves to be devoured of the enemies sword? What fusto his tel- "do you with your armour and weapons? Why began ye war first? Are you trouble-M low fouldiers . . fome and unruly in peace, and cowards in war . What hope haveye in standing still? "Do you look for some god from Heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make way by dint of word. Goto then, and slick to it like men, and that way whereas ye " shallice me go afore, follow ye after, as many of you as mind to see again your home, " your parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampart and trench, but. "armed men that must withstand armed men. In valour ye are their matches, but in respect " of necessity (which is the last and strongest engin of all other) ye are the better, Whenhe had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a fresh shout they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas Post humius Albius had placed against them his cohorts: and compelled the victors to lose ground, until such time as the Dictator came to succour his N men thus distressed, and now ready to retreat: and so he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, Messius, rested all the hope and fortune of the enemies, Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one slain outright, and lest dead in the place. So as now the very Roman Commanders, fought not without bloodshed. Only Posthumius being smitten with a stone, which had broken and bruised his head, went out of the throng: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost nailed to his horse, nor the Consul, for all his arm was quite cut off, once retired or departed out of that dangerous combat, But Meffins amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of most hardy & tall men passed through fo the whole battel in lined thither. The Conful, after he had chased them, scattered in parties here and there, even as far as to the trench, affaileth the very camp and the rampart.

Thither also bringeth the Dictator his power to another fide, Neither was the affault less hot there then the fight was sharp afore. It is said moreover, that the Consul threw an ensign within therampart, to animate the fouldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it:

in forcible manner, and escaped clear to the Volscians leaguer, which as yet was not lost: and o

A and so by recovering the banner again, was the first breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to close fight and hand-firoaks even within the camp, Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yeeld themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavillions taken, they were all sold, but those of Senators calling, Part of the pillage was restored to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part thereof the Dictator fold in port-fale, And leaving to the Conful the charge of the camp, rode himself triumphing into the City, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they blemish the memorial, who write, that A. Posthumius (the Dictator his ion, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate service, he departed without leave from B his quarter and goard) was after his victory atchieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded.

But I lift not to believe it. And lawful it is for me to to do, among fo divers opinions : and a good proof it is on my fide, that fuch imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Manli- Imperia Manana, and not Posthumiana. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such cruelty, liana, should have gotten afore all others, that noted title of cruelty. Belides, Manlius it was, that was furnamed Imperious. But Posthumius is not marked with any odious note at all.

C. Iulius Conful, in the absence of his Collegue, without any casting of lots, dedicated the Temple of Ap llo. Quintius having discharged his army, when he was returned into the City took not that well. But it was no boot to complain in the Senat house. Moreover, in this notable year, fo full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those days no-C thing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (fo great and mortal enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civil dissention and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, for to take part with a fide and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribuns of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribuns might be with Confuls authority chosen: but it could not be obtained. Consuls were made, Lu. Papyrius Crassus, and L. Iulius. The Æquians Embaffadors fuing to the Senat for a league, and for that league, pretending very often to yeeld themselves, and be in subjection, obtained a truce only for 8. years, The Volscians after their overthrow in Algidum, fell to continual debate and contention, whiles fome perswaded peace, and others war: so long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies. So on every fide the Romans were at reft. The Confuls understanding that the Tribuns of the Commons were complotted (for one false brother among them bewrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the estimation of fines and penalties (a thing right plea- An act for fing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were fines and pe-Confuls, L. Sergius Fidence, the second time, and Hostius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In whose year nalties. nothing was there done worthy of rehearfal. After them succeeded Consuls, A. Cornelius Coffus, and Titus Quintius Pennus the second time, The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romans. And a rumor went, that some of the Fidenatian youths were accessary unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commissioners to make inquisition, L. Sergius, Quintus Servilius, and Mamercus Emilius. Some of them were confined to Holtia, for that they could make no found excuse, and justifie their absence for certain days out of Fidene, So E the number of the inhabitants there, was encreased; and their lands, who were flain in the wars,

In that year happed an exceeding great drouth. For not only there wanted rain water from a- A great bove, but also the very earth lacking her natural moisture, scarcely sufficed to maintain the run- drought about ningstream in main rivers. The scarcity of water besides about springs that were dried up, and much mortalithe small rivulets and brooks caused a great death and mortality of cattel for default of drink: tie thereupwhereof some died of the scab: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally. on. The malady first began among the rustical fort, the bond-slaves and hinds: and afterwards spread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only tainted and diseased with this insection: Rome addition but their minds also were troubled and possessed with fundry forts of superdictions religious, and to supersiti F those for the most part strange and forrain: whiles upon vain and foolish propheses, they brought ons. new rites and ceremonies of facrificing into menshoules; and made good gain of fuch as were given to superstitions devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: until such time as now it grew to a publick offence, and the chief of the City were ashamed to see in every street and chappel, strange and unaccustomed purgatory facrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Ædiles had in charge and commission, to look streightly to this disorder; and that no other gods were worshipped, then those of the Romans: nor after any other manner than had been usual in their native country. So their anger against the Veientians, and defire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following, when C. Servilius Hala, and L. Papirius Mugilanus were Consuls. And even then, they made some sctuple to proclaime G war immediately, or to make out any power against them : but they thought good to send their Heralds afore, to make claim for their own and challenge restitution. For whereas of late years

there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds sent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a folemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this there arose some question, whether the war should be proclamed with the peoples allowance & suffrages or the Senates decree were alone sufficient, The Tribuns by giving out and threatning that they H would frop the musters, obtained in the end, that Quintins the Conful should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people, And it patied clear through all the Centuries, Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority, T. Quintius Pennus immediately from his Confulship. C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and Cornelius Coffis: of which Coffis had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had mustered, took a journey to Veii, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whiles every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers couries one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For I the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entred upon the army thus diffracted, whiles some commanded to sound a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battel. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was neer at hand, thither they retired themselves in lasery: so, as the shame they gat was more then the harm in this desear, The City was pensive and hereupon sorrowed, as not used to take soiles and overthrows. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator; in whom refled ever the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Conful, the Augurs were confulted withal: who refolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple, So A. Corneliu (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamercus Æmilius Dictator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Ma- K fter of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true vertue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully digraced and unworthily

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Hetruria, boasting and vaunting that in one battel they had discomfitted three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their folliciting, perswade any to be seen to take part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and affilt them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wife lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as aforethey had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embaffadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veii or Fidene the seat town of the war, Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to fee the army of their enemies removed from Veii, and implanted at Fidene, And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow befides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed fouldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, thop windows that up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then fent the Dictator the Criers about into all freets and lanes, to fummon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them M

And as for A. Cornelius, he wil no doubt be the N fame General of horsemen in this battel, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a ce Knight Marshal, slew Lars Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the fight of two armies: "and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him despoiled. Wherefore " ye ought to remember this, that we have on our fide triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas with the enemies remaineth the wi. ked and detectable fact of killing the Embaffadors, against "the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenatian inhabitants, in time of peace: the brea-"king of truce, and their revolting now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they o "have deserved of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those, who for clipping the Cenfors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had distained "and diffraced my fecond Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach, After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this fide "idene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Trbe". And commanded T. Quintius Pennus his Lieurenant, to gain the hills afore, and be possessed fecretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morrow

A when as the Tuscans, (full of pride and stomack for the prosperous success of former dayes, which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had stayed a while, until the scouts and e pials brought word, that Quintius was gotten fafely unto the Hill top near adjoyning to the Cattle or fort of the Fidenatians, he advanceth forth his standards: and with his footmen ranged in battel array, marched against his enemies with full pace: commanding his General of the Horsemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himself "as need should require, would give the ignal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him "then, to quit himself like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combate with a King: " of his rich present and oblation: and of Romulus and J: piter Feretrius. Thus the legions assail B one another and encounter right hardily. The Romans kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenatians, wicked and godless wretches: the Veientians, Robbers and Theeres; truce-breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embefiadors: fleyned with the execrable massacre of their cohabitants: faithless and treacherous allies, cowardly and daftardly enemies : thus both in word and deed they satisfied their hatred to the full : And at the very first shock forced their enemies to shrink. At which instant all at once, there issued out of the open gates of Fidene a strange army, not heard of nor usual, before that day; A mighty number armed with fireworks; and shining all over with burning lights, after a fanatical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth fight of this kind of fight, amafed the Romans a prety while. Then the Dictator bufy in fight, ha-C ving fent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troups of Hor emen, and also for Quiatirs from the mountains, hastened himself to the left point: which being terrified with a scarefire more like than a battel, had given place unto the flame, and slepped back. Where with a lond The words of voyce he thus spake: " What? will ye be overcome with smoak like a swarm of Bees, and lose your the D staroit "ground, and retreat from your naked and unarmed enemies? will yenot put out this fire with re-"doubled stroke of brandishing swords? And will ye not every man for his part, if we must needs souldiers. " fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and fling "them again at their own heads? Go to, I say, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Ro-"mans, remembring the prowels of your Fathers, and your own felves. Turn this fire upon your " enemies City, and confume Fidene into after with her own flames: this difloyal Fidene, which D " by no favors and good turns of yours ye were ever able to win and pacifie. The bloud of your "Embassadors, the blond of your Coloners thither sent to people their City, your Frontiers and "Borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battaillon was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flew; others by force match them from them, fo that now both battels were armed with fire. The General of Horsemen for his part, renueth the Horse service: commanding them to pluck the bitts out of their Horses mouths; and was the first himself, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in Horseneck, into the midst of the fire: and the other Horses also being pricked forward, and eased of their bridles, carried the riders with full carier against the enemy. The dust rising together with the imoke, took the light from mens eyes, and Hories both. And that fight which had terrified the E souldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horses. Whereloever therefore the men of arms rode they bare down all afore them as if some Houses had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith hapned a new al'arm to be heard, which having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintius the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himself reenforcing the shout, advanceth his ensigns forward more freshly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels pressed fore upon the Tuicans, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flye back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountains, from whence a fresh supply of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither the most part of the Veientians ran scattering in disorder, and highing were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlepits carried them away. And even they that were cunning swimmers, what with wearinesse, and what with faintness of their wounds and with fright, funk and were drowned: so that few of many swam over in safety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The same way also the Romans followed for ibly after and Quintius especially, together with them who erewhile came downsrom the mountains, and were the freshest souldiers for fight (as who came last into the battel) and so afterwards entred pell-mell among their enemies into the gare climbed upon the walls, and from the walls fer up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had won the Town. Which as foon as the Dicator G effied, for now by this time had he made an entrance into the foriorn, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the fouldiers, upon defire to run to a spoil, and hoping of a greater laccage in the City, freight unto the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Castle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to flye for refuge and sitery. The execution in the City was no less than in the field : which continued untill they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life yeelded themselves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was spoiled and sacked. The morrow after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus He drew them by lot, and gave to every Horseman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more

There he some that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battel fought with the flate he had re ei ed. Veientians at Fed. m by thips upen the water. A thing verily, no leis impossible than incredible, Confidering that even at this day, the river is not broad enough for such a purpose; and at that time, (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unleis haply in croffing over the river some veilels or bottoms, that were pur out to meet and to receive them, I were layed, And to, men making the matter greater (as usually it cometh to pais) have defired a vaintitle of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns, with Confuls authority, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Hor. tins Barbains. Then was there a truce granted unto the Veientians for twenty years, and to the Æquians for three years, whereas they had made juit for more. Reft there was also from all feditions and broils in the City. The year following, having neither war abroad nor yet fedition ar home, was famous yet for the playes which in time of war had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as also for the frequent relort and concourse of the Nations adjoyning, The Tribuns with Consuls authority, were Cl. Craffus, Sp. Nautime Ruttlines, T. Serg us Fidenas, and Sextus Julius Tullus. The fight of thete games and pattimes, K whereunto those strangers were come by publick consent of their states, was unto them more acceptable, in regard of the courtely of thole friends that gave them intertainment, 'After these playes there enfued feditious Orations of the Tribuns of the Commons, who rebuked the com-"mon multitude, for that they being beforted with admiration of those whom they had to ha-"ted, kept themselves in perpetual thraldome. And not only durst not attempt to put forth them-" feves for to bring in again the possibility to have Confuls of their part, as in time past : no, nor " fo much as in the creation of Military Tribuns (the Election of whom was indifferent as well "for Commons as Nob.es) were mindful or thought either upon themselves or their friends, and those of their own body; And therefore they should surcease to marvel, why no man plea-"ded for the benefit of the commonarty. For, travel is well bestowed, and danger well adventu- L " red, where profit and honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is to difficult but "men would employ themselves to enterprise the same, if for the adventuring of great exploits, there might be proposed as great rewards. But, that any Tribun of the Commons should run deer fperate, y and blinding into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his perion, and "no hope at all of truit and profit in the end : for which contention, he might be fure that the No-"bles against whom he hrived would perfecute him with deadly and irreconcitable malice: and "at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended; he should be honored and advanced " never the more, it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get "courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them, "they would not diddin the meanest commoner that was, if they themselves might be no more M "de pied. To conclude, the matter were worth the tryal in one or two, whether any commoner " were inflicient to bear a great office of flate; or whether it were a wondrous thing and ftrange "miracle, that a valient and hardy man should arise out of the commonalty. With much a do "((ay they) we got and obtained that Tribuns military with Confuls authority might likewise be "choien out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of State "at home had fired therefore. In the first years they being nipped by you, and so having the re-" pulse, were had inderition of the Nobility: so that at length they sorbare to give themselves "thus contumeliously to be missed and made fools. We see no cause therefore, why that law al-" so should not be repealed wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For "less shame would there arise, if the law were not indifferent nor respective unto them, than as N " unmeet persons and unworthy, thus shamefully to be passed by and take the repulse. These and such like speeches were heard with so good an ear and general applause, that some of them were incited forward to sue for the Mistary Tribunship: whiles every one promised in the time of his office to do great matters, and to propose, some one thing, some another, for and concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impositions upon landed persons, for to pay souldierswages. But the Tribuus military then in place, devised to spye out a time, when upon some occasion of the absence of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and fecret warning, should at a certain day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribuns of the Commons were away, an act of Senate should passe in this form: That for asmuch as it was o noised that the Volicians were entred into the Lands of the Hernicks to forrage and rob, the military Tribuns should go to see whether it were to or no, and that in the mean while there should be held a general affembly for the Election of Confuls. The Tribuns military took their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs son, Governour of the City, a four young Gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred against the Tribuns and the Commons. And bootless it was either for the Tribuns of the Commons to find themselves grieved with those, who made the decree, now that they were

A absent, nor yet had they cause to quarrel with Appin Claudius, because the thing had been contrived and past afore his time. So, Confuls were created, C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus.

A forrein matter, but yet worthy to be remembred and here inferred, is reported to have hapned that year: to wit, that Vulturnum a City of the Tuicanes, which now is Capua, was by the Sampites taken: and that it came to be named Capua of one Capus their Captain, or (which toundeth more like a truth) of the champian field. But they wan it by this means. For upon occasion that the Tulcans were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the fociety of their City and territory. And on a folemn feastival day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies, and B were found affeep, these new Coloners the Samnits, secupon the old inhabitants, and in the night

But now to return. Things passing thus (as I said before) the Consuls abovenamed upon the *13 of De-*Ides of December, entred their government. By which time not only they which were of pur- cember. pose sent to learn the news of the Volicians, brought word that war was at hand, but Embassadors. alio from the Latins and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volicians were more buly and occupied, either in chung of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out their speeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away fouldiery, and for ever make account to bear the voke of thraldom; or elfe not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom they flrove Cfor foveraignty, either in manhood or in painful travel, or in Discipline of warfare. And furely they were no vain tidings that those messengers reported. But the Senators would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal, C. Semp onius, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, prefuming uponfortune, as if the were alwayes right constant and at command, and leading an army of a people used to victory, against those that were wont to be overcome, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speak a truth, there was more Roman Discipline in the Volscian host, than in the Roman. And so, fortune (as oftentimes else) went with vertue. At the first encounter, which by Sempronius was unheedfully and unadvisedly begun before that either the battaillons were reinforced and strengthened with fresh supplies of succour, or the Horsemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to handstrokes. And the first

D token which way the victory would encline, was the manner of shout at the first charge; which by the enemy was moreloud, more shrill and continual; but by the Romans dissonant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often renued : and by their uncertain and variable noise, they bewrayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies so much the more eagerly charged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thick with their bright swords: on the other fide, the Romans helmets wag, and their crefts nod every way as they look about them: and as they were to feek what to do, so they tremble and run together on heaps: one while the enfigns stand still; and were abandoned of the formost fighting in the vanguard another while they retired in again amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the slight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans fought more to cover and shrowd themselves than to fight: to ward E blows rather than to strike. The Volscians set forward their entigns, pressed upon the main battel, and law more enemies under foot flain than running away. And now in all places the Romans retired, notwithstanding Sempronius the Consul both rebuked and also exhorted them to flick to it: for neither his commandment nor the authority and Majesty of his countenance availed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempanius, a Decurion of Horsemen, had not in this desperate case, with a resolute courage and ready advise, helped at a pinch: Who cryed with a loud voyce, that those Horsemen which would the Six. Tempa safety of the common-wealth, should dismount off their Horses. And when the Cornets of Horsemen bestirred themselves at his words no less than if the Consul had given commandment; " Un-" less (faith he) this troup of men of arms, flay the violence of the enemies, we see the last of the F"Roman Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my lance: let "both Romans and Volcians fee, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or "Horse. Whose encouragement being approved and received with a short, he advances forward, bearing his staffaloft: and what way soever they go, they enter and make room with forcible (way: and where they see their fellows in greatest distress, thither they make speed, oppoing their targets, afore them. And thus in every place whereas they throst themselves forcibly, was the fight renued: and doubtless the enemies had turned their backs, if possible it had XX been, for so few to have performed every thing at once Now when as the General of the Volscians, saw his men not able to withstand them, he gave a signal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, these Targettiers: until such time as they had put themselves so for-G ward, that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done chefe Horsemen were enclosed on every fide; neither could they breakthrough that way which they went, because the enemies were there thickeft, where they had made their lane before. The Cof. then, with the legions of the Romans, having loft the fight of those that been a shield of defence and bulwark erewhile to the whole army, left that formany hardy mentious invironed; should be overpressed by the enemies; retolved to adventure any peril or hazard what soever. The Volscians were likewife diverfly occupied actroubled. For on the one fide they bare off the Cof, and legions : on the other fide they affronted Tempanius fore, & the Horsemen; who seeing that after many affayes and offers they could not break forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certain little Hill, and cast them $_{\rm H}$ felves into a ring and flood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Conful also maintained the battel so long as he could fee, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them afunder, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand, And for that the event was unknown, who fped the better, fo great a terrour came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their carriages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next into them, Howbeit the Hill or bank aforeiaid, continued still befet round about, until midnight, But when word was brought thither to the Affailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in 7 the dark as well as they could. Tempanius, fearing an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volscians were left and for laken: he was full glad thereat, and called down his fouldiers from the mount, and entreth into the Roman camp, where feeing all void and forlorn, and finding the same desolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volscians upon knowledge of their errour should return again, he took with him those hurt souldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Consul was gone, marcheth forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the reft, those Horsemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in pub- K like. The Cof. Fabius, feeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horsemen aforesaid afar off : but not without some sear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being foon known, they caused so great contenument after former fear, that in most joyful manner, the noise went through the City, how the Horsemen were returned fafe with victory. And out of those mourning and forrowful houses, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran into the streets and high wayes by heaps. The fearful dames also and wives, forgetting, for joy, all decent and womanly modesty, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open armes upon their own husbands and fons, took them about the neck, clipped and kiffed them, and with all their hand and heart received them; yea, and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribuns of the Commons, who had challenged and accused M. Post humius and T. Quin-

tim, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Vej: feemed to have good occa-fion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Conful Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and diffrace, for to renue the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them. Having affembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed first, at Veij by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away withal, and unpunished, therefore the army in Volses was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troup of most valiant knights were thus cast away and given to be murdered, and the camp shamefully left and forfaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribuns, commanded Tempanius the Horseman tuny lett and tonaken. Then C. Junus, one of the Thomas commanded temporates the Trottenian to be called, and before them all faid. I would know of thee O Sextus Temporatus, whether thou M et think that C. Semproints the Conful, either began battel in good time, or strengthned his battaillous with good succors and supplies? or whether thou thy self, when as the Romain legions " and footmen were discomstred, of thine own head and policy, causedst the Horsemen to alight " on foot, and thereby reenforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were "fhut out from our battel, whether either the Conful himself came to rescue, or sent any succor " unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadst any aid or refcue at all? Whe-"ther thou and thy troup of Horsemen brake through into the camp by your own hardiness and " valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Conful or army, or rather the pavilions aban-"doned, and the fouldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To these premisses and points, " hast thou to speak this day upon thy vertue, and the faith of a souldier: by which only, in this N "war-fervice the Common-weal hath flood preserved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where cour legions be? Whether thou wert forfaken thy felf, or whether thou forfookeft the Conful

"and the army? And to conclude, whether we have loft or wonthe field? To these demands, Tempanian made (as they fay) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a souldier : not full of answer of rem. felf-praises, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wife: How great skill (quoth he) of mattial feats, and what sufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a fouldier to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voyces, in a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. " And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the "policies of a General Captain, or vertues and duties of a Conful: deep points to be examined, O "weighed, and discoursed by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I

" with mine eye faw, I am able to make report and tellify; namely, That before himself was ex-"cluded out of the battel, I beheld the Conful fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging "his men earneftly, and even amongst the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies, bushly

"employed. After which I was carried from the fight of my fellows, howbeit by the ftir, noise and "fhouring, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as "I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude

A" of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not : But I suppose, that " as I my felf in an extremity and fearful case, defended my felf and my men, by advantage of the " ground : fo the Conful for to fave the army; took some more sate place to encamp in. Neither think I verily, that the Volscians stood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the "darkness of the night (no doubt) caused errour and confusion on every side, and in all places, After which speech when as he belought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travel, and faint of his wounds: he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant fervice and also of his modest speech, licenced to depart, Whiles these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavicum B as far as to the Temple of * Quies: thither were wains, draught-beafts and sumpter Horses sent from the City, to receive and ease the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journying all of rest and Renight. Within a while after, the Cof, entred into the City: who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himself, than to extol Tempanius, and give him his due deserved praises. Now whiles the City was fad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains: behold, M. Posthumius, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribun Military in place of a Col. at Veij, and now was condemned, & a fine fet on his head of ten thousand Asses of brass, But as for Titus Quintius, 31lib,5 fh. flet. his fellow in government, because that among the Volscians he had served fortunately as Consul under the conduct of Posthumius Tibertus the Dictator: and likewise at Fidene, as Lieutenant of

C the other Dictator Mamercus Amylius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himself, upon his collegue before condemned: he was found unguilty and acquit by all the Tribes. It is faid that the fresh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worshipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capitolinus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly belought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of to heavy news unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribuns of the commonalty, Sex. Tempanius, A. Sellius, Sex. Antistius, and Sex. Pompilius in their absence: whom also the Horsemen had cholen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the advise and counsel of I empanius. But the Senators, because now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Consuls milliked and offended them, determined that military Tribuns with Confuls authority, should be created, So D there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Papyrius Mugilanus,

In the very beginning of the year L. Hortenfus the fifth Tribun of the commonalty, accused C. Sempronius the Conful of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the fight of the people of Rome befought him, not to trouble their guiltless Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverse fortune: Hortenfius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his resolute constancy: and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribuns, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that hauty courage and stomack, so ordinary in those of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which rested and relied upon innocency? since that he ha-E ving been a Consul, was fain to shelter and shrowd himself under the shadow and protection of the Tribuns? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribuns: but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I prosecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end; Will ye take from the people their right, and overthrow the authority of the Tribuns among the Commons. When they again said and inferred, that the people of Rome had absolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would nor could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (fay they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in stead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company, Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortenfins) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribuns arrayed in soiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no F more to say to him, fince that he hath carried himself so, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiers. Neither was the kindness of those four Tribuns more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortenfius, who at their reasonable request, was so easy to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune fawned upon the Equians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volicians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Quintius Capitelinus, the son of Capitolinus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allosted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Æquians had made semblance of a battel, and brought their army only in fight, they were in fearful wife foon discomfitted, and shamefully fled, ministring no matter of great ho-G nor to the Cof. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the losse which happened by Sempronius was partly allayed it was granted that he might enter Ovant into the City. [A General was faid to enter Ovant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on Horseback only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy, redoubled Ohe. or Oho. So that Ovatio is a much as Ohatio: How foever, fome think take as a mas that Ovatiotook the name of facrificing a sheep. But he rode in triumph, when his souldiers attended him in his chariot crying Io Triumphe. In this he caried a branch or ware a garland of lawrel, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a less honor than the Triumph. And it was granted to inferior persons, and for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless H he were Dictator, Coi, or Pretor, and had flain in field 5000 enemies at the leatt, won much (poil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire.] Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they teared: to in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of ditcords and troubles more than they espected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that beildes two Quellors or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Confuls, for all services and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles alio with all their power had approved it, the Tribuns of the Commons entred into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Queftors (for until that time they had been cre- I ated from out of the degree of the Parriti only) might be likewife of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main, But afterwards having granted thus much, That as the ule and practile was in creating of Tribuns with Confuls authority, to in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free liberty to chuie. And feeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribuns took it in hand again, and fer it on toor: yea, and other fedicious actions befides very often sprang forth, and among the reft, those also concerning the Law Agraria. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be Confuls rather than Comular Tribuns created; and by reason of the Tribuns stepping between K with their negative voyce, no decree of the Senate could passe, the government of the Commonweal was devolved from Confuls to an Interreign, but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribuns kept the Patritij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribuns and certain Interregents, whiles one while the Tribuns stayed the Nobles from assemveraign Mabling together about the chunng of an Interregent, and another while croffed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senate or warrant, for the election of Confuls: at the laft, L. Pappriss Mugillanue, being declared Interregent, fornetimes rebuked the Nobles, and fornetimes blamed the Commons, and faid: "That the Common-wealth neglected and forlors of all men, was "taken into protection of the Gods, and guided by their care and providence: standing upright L The Oration and fare only, upon the truce observed by the Veientians, and the flow speed or final haft that of L. Papyrius "the Æquiansmade to war. From whence, if any trouble should happen to arise, it is your will the Nobles & "(quoth he) and pleasure belike, that the state should be surprised and assailed, whiles it is with-"our any Magistrate of the Nobility. For neither is there an army ready, nor yer a Captain to "raife an army. What ? think ye to put back forrain war abroad by civil discord at home? Which " if they both should come together, there were no other remedy though all the Gods in Heaven " should set to their helping hand, but that the Common-west of Rome should utterly be subver-"ted. Yet rather remit every one of you somewhat of the rigor of your full jurisdiction, and "(for the love of God) take some indifferent course to joyn in unity: the Nobles for their part, " by fuffering Military Tribuns to be created in lieu of Cost, the Tribuns again, by no more thwar M "ting and interpoling their negative, but that four Quelfors may be cholen by the free voyces of "the people, from out of the Commons and Nobles, one with another. First therefore was the High Court held for choosing soveraign Tribuns: and Tribuns there were created in Consular authority, all of the Nobility; namely L. Quinties Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furim Medullinus the second time, M. Manlins, and A. Sempronius Atratinus. When this Tribun last named, was president of the Election for Questors, and the son of Antissius a Tribun of the Commons, and a brother belides to another Tribun, one Sex. Pompilius flood for the dignity, among certain other of the Commoners: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voyces they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to the place, according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whose fathers and grand-fathers they had seen Con-N fuls. All the Tribuns of the Commons flormed and chafed at this, but especially Pompilius and Antifius, being set on fire at the repulse of these their friends. "What should this mean (ay "they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their own merits, nor confidering the "injuries at the Nobles hands nor yet for defire they might pretend to the first hansel of that au-"thority, which now was lawful, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I say) was "created, if not a Military Tribun, yet not formich as a Queftor? What, that neither the fathers "prayer in the behalf of his fon, nor a brothers fuit in favour of a brother, being Tribuns both of "them, invested in that facred authority, and which first was erected for the maintenance of com-"mon freedom, could ought at all prevail? Surely there is some fraud and jugling in the matter: "and A. Sempronies, hath in the Election wied more art and cunning than truth and fidelity, O Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foil. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his own person and attach him, being senced with innocency in this Action, and fecured by vertue of the office which then he bare : they wreaked their felves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the coulin germain of Arra-tions by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleius, one of their collegues, arrefled himfor the ignominious service in the Volscian war. Ever and anon, also the same Tribuns made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law

A Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times most sharply and eagerly had withstood. Supposing, as it fell out indeed, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be less esteemed of the Nobles: or if he flood to it fill until the time of judgment drew near, he should dispicate and offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposed and bent against him, and so to wound his own private estate: than to betray the common and publike cause: and persisted resolute in the same minde still that there should no bribing donative be granted, that might win and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribuns: "For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shoot at, for the benefit of the The fingular Commons; that is not their feeking: but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: constancy of

The day of judicial tryal came. When as he had pleaded for himself, and seemed nothing daunted at the matter: ver, for all that ever the Nobles could do, who tryed all means, but in vain, to mitigate and de-Jay the beat of the Commons, condemned he was in 'fifteen thousand Asses. The same year was Cumes, a City inhabited at that time by the Greeks, taken by the Campanians.

The year following had military Tribuns with Confuls authority, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Namius Servilius. A year, by the happinels and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger escaped, than for any harm received. Certain A conspiracy bond-fervants had conspired to fire the City in divers places far a funder: for this intent, when the of bonds flaves people should be busily occupied, here and there, to save their houses, then by force and armes to D surprise the Castle and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked designs.

For by the peaching and information of twain, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. But those that disclosed and revealed the conspiracy, had ten thousand pound in brass mony 31 lib.5. Ib. fl. (which was in those dayes thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom besides, for their reward. After this, began the Æquians to renue war: and word was brought to Rome by credible persons, that certain new enemies also, to wit, the Lavicans, joyned together in counsel with the old. These Equians, were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they used to put the City of Rome to the pains of warring with them, and not miss. Embassadors then were sent to Lavicos, who brought doubtful answers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they E were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tufculans were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new itirs and troubles should arise at Lavicos. There came Embassadors from Tusculum, to L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the fon of Q. Servilius Priscus: (by whom being Dictator, Fidene was won) who were Military Tribuns in Confuls authority the year following. These Embassadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Æquians army, had forraged the country of Tusculum, and encamped themselves in Algidum. Then was war proclaimed against the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Confular Tribuns should go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome: there arofe a contention on a Sunday, among the faid Tribuns. Every one thought himself the meetest and most sufficient man, to be General of F the war, refusing the charge of the City, as a bale, dishonourable, and thankless office. As the Senators mused and wondred, to see amongst those that were fellows in government so undecent a firife and contention; then Q. Servilius: "Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, "either of this honorable house, or of the Common-wealth: the father his countenance and "dread Majesty, shall end this debate. My son without any lot casting, shall govern the City as "President. God grant, that they which love war so well, may manage it with more discretion "and concord than they wish it. As for a general muster to be levied out of all the people in-differently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger fort were prest forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribuns. The strife which began to be kindled among them in the City, through the same defire still of soveraignty, brake forth and G grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, striving whose opinion should stand: each one would have his own way: his own commandments obeyed and none else: one despised another, and were despised one of the other; until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproof, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each other day, rule one alone by himselfabsolurely. Which news being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his years and long experience right skillfull prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribuns, the Common-wealth sustained not more harm, than they had received at Veios. Ad as if there were no doubt, but that some great loss and overthrow was ready to happen, he was instant upon his son, to levy fouldiers, and to provide munition for war. He Neither proved he a salfe and vain Prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whose day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the trench, and to trayned them thither upon a foolifth hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of disadvantage, they were inddenly charged by the Aquians, discomfired and chaied down the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and slain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had befet a great part of the camp, they shamefully sled away, at the back gate, and forfook the camp. The Captains, Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the army, which kept to their enfigns and colours, went to Tufeulum. Other that were scattered here and there I about the fields by fundry wayes, made halt to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Less was the trouble and forrow, because men looked for no better issue and success: and also for that, there was help and succour (which they were to have an eye unto in to fearful a cafe) provided by the Tribuñ aforehand. At whose commandment, when as the tumult was by the inferiour Magistrates appealed in the City, espials were sent out in hast: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tufculum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senates decree, Q. Servilius Prifeus was chosen Dictator, a man whose Providence over the Common-weal, the City as many other times afore, so in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribuns afore this unhappy soil. Who having nominated Gene- K ral of the Horlemen, his fon (as fome lay) by whom being military Tribun, himfelf was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hala was that year General of the Horse) went forth with a fresh army to war, and having joyned unto him those which were at Tusculum he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But see the fruit of good success. The pride and neeligence which had been amongst the Roman Captains, went from them to the Æquians, Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horsemen whom he fent against them, had disordered and pur out of array the formost ranks of the enemies, then commanded he the entigns of the legionary footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one enfign-bearer of his own, who made fome flay, he flew with his own hand. Then were they to earneflly fet to give an hot charge, that the Acquians could not abide their force: and being in L fight overthrown, when as they fied all amain to the camp, the affault thereof was both shorter and with lefs ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and poiled, and that the Di-dand with lefs ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and poiled, and that the Di-cator had given the pillage unto the fouldiers: and that the Horsemen, which chaled the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrown, and a great part of the Equians were fled to Lawiess: the day following was the army also led thither, and the Town compassed and befet round about, scaled, and sacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eight day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any ledition firred up about the Law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribuns of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony should be sent to Lawicos. So there were sent from the City M planted at La a thousand and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apiece given them of Land. After the winning of Lavices, there were created Military Tribuns with Confuls authority, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucreiius Tricipitinus (all three been fold or affigned to the Commons this seemed to be a bone cast between the Nobles and the Commons, to set them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribuns any way to take countel in this cale, albeit one while they affembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appius Claudius, (the nephew or grandlon of notorious Appins the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the puny of all the counsel.

The speech of of the Nobility, made (as it is reported) this speech, and said, "That he would impart unto them Ap Claudius 10 "that which he had received by tradition from his ancestours, to wit, an old devile, and appro-the Sensors, "priate to his honse, for that his great grandsize Appius Claudius, had shewed unto the Nobles O "the only way, to abate and take down the Tribuns power; namely, by the coming between "and negative voyce of their fellows. Which speech, when they all had approved, and especially Q. Servilius Prisons, who praised the young Gentleman, for that he was not grown out of kind, nor degenerate from the to k and rate of the Claudy, then every man was let about this but nels, to fee whom of the Coiledge or company of Tribuns, they could win and draw to crofs and ftop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the chief of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribuns, and were in hand with them perswading, ex-B horting, and affuring them, that they should every or e in private gratify not only, but also the whole body of the Senate in general and never gave over, until they had procured fix of them to interpose their negative, and to cross the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded afore the Senate, about the fedition which Mecilius and Metilius had raised, by a Largets of dangerous confequence; fuch freeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himself confessed, that now they were to seek for counsel, and saw no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribuns; to the protection and fategard of which Magistracy, the Common-weal betook her self, and fled for fuccour, as being beset with danger, like some poor private person, and had no other means to save her self: saying, That it would be both for themselves, and also for their authority, an honorable thing, if it might appear, that the C puissance of their Tribunship were not more imployed in moletting the Senate, and making dilcord among the States than in resisting the peevish wilfulnes of their collegues, Whereupon arose a great noise through the whole company of the Senators, whiles out of all parts of the Court there affembled . they called upon the Tribuns for their helping hand. Then after filence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senite, were made aforehand to their cause) declared and confessed, that they were ready to cross that act, by their fellows published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. Their Tribuns for the offer of their good tervice, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the Authors and Patrons of the Act aforefaid, calling together an affembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows most sharply, terming them betrayers of the Common-wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and u-D fing other bitter speeches, gave over their action and suit.

Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Coffus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintius Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, were military Tribuns in Coss. authority) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the superstitious fear of their own Princess whose grounds, Tybris (overflowing the banks) had spoiled, and overthrown also the villages and houses that stood thereupon. The Equians likewise by reason of their loss received three years before, made no great hast to aid and assist the Volans, a people of their own nation. For they had made certain rodes into the Lavicans Country, confining upon them, and warred upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which trespais by them done they hoped to have been able to maintain, by the banding and affiftance of all the Æquians : but being for faken of their allies, they E loft both their Town and territory, only by fiege, and one light skirmish, and never fought for it any memorable war. L. Sextess also Tribun of the Commons, assayed to make an Act that there might be fent to Vola as well as to Lavicos, Coloners to people it : but by the negative of his Affociates, who shewed, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commons to pass without the affent of the Senate, it came to nothing. In the year following, the Æquians having recovered and won again Vola, and brought a Colony thither, fortified the Town with a fresh power, at what time were Tribins Military in Coninls authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Coffus, L. Valerius Potitus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Rogillensis. The war against the Equians, was committed to this Posthumius, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victory shewed more than the whole course of the F war. For having levied an army in haft, and brought it before Vola, after some small skirmishes, he tamed the Æquians, and at length entred the Town. And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarrel with his own fouldiers: for whereas during the time of the affault, he had given out by Proclamation, That they should have the saccage after the Town was once won: he brake promise with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cause rather why the army mutined and was discontented, than for that in a Town lately sacked before and in a new Colony, there was found less spoil than the Tribun made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived was made the worse after that he retu ned into the City : for being sent for by his fellows, upon occasion of the Tribunitian sedictions, there escaped him an indiscreet speech I must needs fay yea, and without all fence, wit, and honefty. Which he let fall in an affembly of the G Commons: wherein it hapned, that as Sextual a Tribun of the Commons, was preferring the law Agraria, and faying withal, That he would propose an Act that Coloners should likewise be sent to Vola, for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vola, who had by fword and spear conquered the same: Posth mius caught the word out of his mouth! Ard that shall my fouldiers, deerly abide (quoth he)unless they be more quiet. Which word being overheard offended not so the Com presently there in place affembled, as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Moreover the Tribun aforefaid, an active man and eloquent withal, having among his adverlaties met with a proud humorous spirit; and an intolent and intemperate tongue, which walked fo freely and fo long by his provocation, that he uttered thele speeches, which bred not only ill H will and displeasure to himself, but also wounded the caule, and the whole state of the Parritij. This Sextus (1 iay) was bufy, and quartelling with none of all the Mintary Tribuns, more than with Peftiumous. And even at that time, taking advantage of the same cruel and inhuman speech of his: Hear ye not, O ye Commons (quoth he) how he threat neth miss hief unto his souldiers, as unto bondslaves? "And yet this beast ye will think more worthy of so great dignity wherein "ye have placed him, than those that indue you with house and land, that fend you abroad to in-"habit Colonies, that provide habitation for you against old age that tendring your wealth, take and defend you against to cruel and proud adversaries. Begin now henceforth comarvel why so sew take in hand to maintain your cause: For what may they look for, and hope at I "your hands? for honors, which ye bellow rather upon your advertages, than those that are "affectionate desenders of the people of Rame. Ye fighed even now and ground again, at the " words uttered out of this foul mouth. But what matter makes that? If ye were now to go to "an election, and to give your voyces, ye would no doubt for all that, prefer this man (who "threatneth to milchiet you) afore them that are willing and defirous to effablish your Lands, " your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that lewd language of Posthumius was reported once to the souldiers, it bred a far greater indignation (be fure) within the camp. How now ? (fay they) is he, who hath intercepted our booty, and defrauded us poor fouldiers of our due, not content therewith, but mult menace mischief besides untous, as his variets? When as therefore they openly muttered thereat, and the Questor or K Treasurer P. Seftus thought that the mutiny might be reftrained with the same violence by which it was first raised: he sent an Officer to one clamorous souldier, that kept a noise above the rest. Whereupon arose an ourcry and a brawl: and he got himself a good rap with a stone for his labour, that he was fainto go out of the presse. And he that imote him, ipake aloud bendes, and bad the Quesior take now that for his pains in a mischief. which the General had threatened his fouldiers, Post humin, in this hurliburly was sent for, and he, when he was come, made all worse and worle with his sharp examinations, tortures, and cruel punishments. At the last, when he could not fee to make an end nor bridle his choler: they all ran on heaps together, at the lamentable ry of those whom he commanded to be choked in the mire and killed under the hurdle : and he half befides himself tuli foolishly fteps down in more hast than good speed from the Tribunal [feat, to chattife one that contested with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Lictors and Centurions every where laid about them to make way, and ill intreated the multitude in the throng they moved their patience to muchy that in that furious fit of the fouldiers; the Military Tribun was by his own army floned to death. Which horrible act, after it was noised at Rom:, and the Military Tribun: by the Senates authority, were about to fit in commission for the examination of the death of their collegue, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribuns of the Commonalty opposed themselves, and refisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrel. For the Senate doubting left that the Commons for fear of those examinations intended, would in their anger create Tribuns military from out of their own body and degree; were very careful, and studied all they could, that Consuls might be chosen again, But when as the Tri-M buns of the Commons would not fuffer an act of the Senat to pass, and hindred also the election of the Conius the matter came to an Interreign. But in the end the Nobles had the upper hand, For when as Q. F. bini. Vibulanus the Interregent, held a Court for the aid Election; there were created Confus A. Cornel us C ffus, and L. Furius Medullinus. In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree; that the Tribuns with all speed possible strould propose unto the Commons, concerning the inquisition of Posthumus his death and that they should make the Commissioner and Judge whom they would. The Commons by the confent of the whole people, gave the Confins commission to fee it done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithlianding, that with exceeding moderation and lentry, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made N themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commonily took it very hainoully, and in the highest degree, saying. That the Aes and Ordinances, which had been propounded concerning their weal and commodities, those lay a long time asleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloudshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of so great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittest time, that after these mutinous souldiers were chastisted, the division of the Volane territory; should have been offered unto them for to comfort their poor hearts again, By which deed (no doubt) their hot defire and longing after the law Agraria, had been abated, which tended to disposses at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were leized of. But this indignity fluck in their flomacks, and was taken neerer to the heart, when they faw the Nobility fo fliffly O bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also quest from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the rest) to be a booty, and divident, to be frared among a few.

The same year, were the legions led by Furing the Conful. against the Volscians: who forraged the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentianim, whither a great number of the Volicians had retired themselves. The booty there was less than they hoped unwilling to divide among the people to much as the wast and void ground, lately gotten by con-

A for: by reason that the Volscians, seeing small hope of keeping the Town, trusted up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow after, being left well near destitute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year now was passed in good quiet by the modesty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place : there succeeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Icilius, when Q. Fabius Ambustus and C. Furins Pacilius were Confuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was bufy in stirring new seditions (as if it had been a task imposed upon his name and linage) by proposing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a pestilence, more fearful than hurtful, which turned A pestilence. away mens minds, from their publick affemblies and accustomed contentions, to tend their B houles, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the fickness was less dangerous than the seditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excused, as it were, and well escaped with the fickness only of many and death of very few: presently after this pestilent year, followed (as it is commonly seen) a great dearth of corn, by reason of the neglect of tillage. M. Papyrius Atratinus, and C. Nautius Ruslius being Confuls. This famine would A famine have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by fending forth their Embassadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tuscan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and trassique with the Samnits, who held at that time Capua and Cumer: but contrary-wile bountifully were they relieved by the Tyrants or Potentates of Sicilie. And such was the willing endeavour of

C Hetruria, that great flore of victuals came downthe Tyber. In what desolation the City was, during this affiction, the Coff tryed by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassiage, but with one enator, they were compelled to adjoyn two Knights unto them. And fetting abde the sicknels and dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overblown, and that care past: then began again the old troubles wherewith the City had usually been disquieted: diffention at home, and war abroad.

When M. Amylius and C. Valerius Potitus were Confuls, the Equians made preparation for wars, and handed with the Volkians. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commission; yet such as would of themselves serve for hire or wages, followed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the Country of the Latins and Hernicks) whiles Va-D lerini the Conful mustered his men and levied fouldiers : M. Menenius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himself against him. And when as by reason of the protection and affiliance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a fouldiers oath against his will: inddenly news came, that the Castle of Carventus was by the enemies forced. This dishonorthus received, as it was a cause that Menenius was hated among the Noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withstand the law Agraria; more just cause to refult their collegue. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Consuls called both God and man to witness, that whatsoever shame or loss either had been already received, or were like to be susteined by the enemies: the blame should be imputed to Menenius, who hindred the mustering. And Menenius protested again aloud, that if the E unlawful Landlords, would furrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjuftly deteined, he would not flay the musters. Then the nine Tribuns, by setting down a decree between them, made an end of the strife: and pronounced by authority of their colledge, that they would armed with this decree and warrant, after he had caused some sew to be had away by the neck and laid fast, that called upon the Tribun for help, the rest for fear were sworn to serve. Thus the army wasled forth to the Caftle of Carventus. And although the fouldiers were as odious to the Conful as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first coming, having mansuly and lustily dispossessed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The souldiers who were slipt away from the hold, and F gone a plundering, by their negligence gave the Romans a opportunity to enter and to iurprise it. And a good booty there was: by reason that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of fafety. Which being fold in portfale, the Conful commanded the treasurers for affift C. Valerius the Cof. (all contradiction of their collegue not withstanding) to award any penalty restreint or chastilement, upon them that refused to be enrolled for warfare. The Cos, being to bring the mony into the common Chamber of the City: giving out thele words withal, that the army should then have part of spoil, when they denied not their service in war. Hereupon both Commons and fouldiers were more angry with the Conful. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entred the City Ovant, in a pety triumph, the fouldiers according to their licentious manner (in that case permitted) followed after with fongs and fonners, answering one another in rude rime and gross meeter by alternative staves. Wherein the Consul was greatly blamed, but Menenius the Tribun, his name was let out to the height his praises were blasoned and G extolled aloft: and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that flood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applause. Striving much to exceed the fongs charred by the souldiers. Which caused the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the malapert sauciness of the souldiers with their Consuls, which is an ordinary and usual fashion among them. And Menenius (who doubtless had been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had toed for it) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Contuls, So there were created Confuls, Cn. Cornelius Coff 13, and L. Furius Medullinus the second time.

hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For H this was the fift time that the Queftors were made of the commonalty: to that in chuting of 4. there was but one place left for (. Fat ins Ambufus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonanty, Q. Silms, P. Alius, and P. Pipius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble houles, I find that the periwaders of the people to use their full liberty in bestowing their voyces, were the three Ic. 1 j, (descended of that house, which ever was most malitiously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but fo, as they flatly gave out and faid, They would not fir at all, if the people had not courage enough, fo much as in the election of Queilors, which only the Senat had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect I that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they feemed to have made a way and overture for new rifen upflarts, to be advanced to Confulfhips and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wife flormed, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter lose thereof: protesting that if things went to on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, imployed about nothing elfe but to facrifice (forfooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds netled and provoked, K whiles the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not fo free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wife, the Icil j perfitted ftill, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Confuls had been prefented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they defired and fought for. But fee, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volicians and Acquians were departed out of their own Confines, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob I. and spoil. To the which war, when as by vertue of an order from the Senar, the Consuls began to muRer: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it : giving out that this occurrent fortuned happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick, active and conragious men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully descended. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Confuls, to keep them awork, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all affemblies, with their Orations, one whiles to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they defired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons fide, Messengers came with news, that whiles the fouldiers that M laying arrifon at the Caftle Carven ana, were stept a fide to get a booty, the Equians having slain a few warders that kept the hold, entred it: and that all the fouldiers were flain: fome as they ran into the fort again, others as they were feattered in the fields. This thing falling out fo crofs against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designments of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would fur ease from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the publick calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated; That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded : no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby, no doubt, the Senat N noted and pointed at the Ieili, whom they charged to feek to be Confuls, for a reward of their feditious Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all

Sundry Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Confuls went to the Castle Carventa a or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election, In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had affilled the Castle Florg time without effect they were compelled from thence to remove and that Verrugo in the Country of the Volicius by the same army was recovered, and that great for raging there was, and driving of booties, both in the Country of the Aquians and also of the Volicians, Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty reflect in this, that they had the Election which they defired: fo 0 in the iffine and successe of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation, there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius Tullus, Cn, Cornelius Coffus C. Servilius Hals. Men fay that the Nobles used a subtile practile and conning device, which even then the Icilii charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitors with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be menof no worth, and loathing the notable batenesse that appeared in their persons.

After this, tidings came, that the Volicians and Æquians (were it that the Castle of Carventus which they held and guarded still, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Ve. THE o drave them into anger) were up in arms, with all force ready to make war: that the Antiats were the principal and thief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had soilicited the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and infering the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrifon of Verruge to be surprized and lost. Moreover, that not only hosts of armed men were sentagainst them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves, had bestowed upon the Hernicks B the town Ferentinum, which they had won from them. At these speeches they were kindled and fet on fire: and in all places whither they went to follicit, the younger fort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more sear then need was. And the Senat presently (which in all searful occurents was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they fay) took in great displeasure, And hereof ensued much heart-burning and differtion, whiles the LL, of the Senat of one fide complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat: and at the last had recourse to the Tribuns of the Commons for help-alledging with al that the very C Confuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overfuled and set down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other fide, rejoycing at the discord of the Senators, made anfwer again, and faid, "That for their parts, they were not able to yeeld any succour at all, who "were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet so much "as in the number of men. But if to be (lay they) dignities and honors were communicated to "us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate what soever, the "Senats decree should be made frustrat and disanulled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the No-"bles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves " also exercise the Tribuns authority if they would. This discord falling out so unfitly, when so great war was inhand, occupied and possessed mens heads a long time: whiles Julius and Corneli-D 11 one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hala, who alfo was a Tribun Military spake and said: "I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubt. The Oration ful in mine opinion, or to feek what to fay, (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his of So "advice by himfelf, and go from the publick Councel?) but because I had rather, that my bre-"thren of their own accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Tribuns "power to be called for, against them. And even now al'o, if the case would permit, I could wil-"lingly give them time and space to retract their too too obstinat, perverse and peremptory opi-" nion. But feeing that thenecessities of war, wait not upon human counsel, I will have more re-

E « spect and consideration of the West-publick, than of the savor of my brethren. Wher. fore, if the « Senat persist still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominat a "Dictator. And if any one withstand me, I will ask no more, than the power and vertue of the Se-" nats Act, By which speech of his, having won deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him nominated General of the horsemen. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Collegues, That otherwhiles favour and honor foonest fall to them that least defire the same. The war was smal and nothing memorable for in one easie and slight battel were the enemies overthrown and slain at Antium. The army upon this victory wasted the Volscians Country, won by force the Castle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volscians within their walls, F notable to keep their frontiers. The Dictitor, after he had performed this war in such fort, as only he might not feem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it stil in ure, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and refigned up his place.

The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the chusing of Consuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created) published the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, feeing their cause betrayed even by rhose of their own company. Wherefore, as in the former year, by foilting in the basest of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to be despised : so, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to stand for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created four, Gall having aforeborn that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Hala. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthy parts, as for the late lavour which he won by his rare moderation, and fingular carriage of himfelf.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heralds of Arms to challenge of them amends and restitution. Whom as they entred into their territory, the Embassage of the Veientians encountred in the way requesting them not to go forward to Veii, before they had presented themselves to the Senat of Rome.

140 Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from feeking their own vantage by other mens distress and calamity. Also at the Volfrians hands they fultained damage by loss of their garrison at Verrugo. But (see what a thing it is to flack the time) For whereas the fouldiers befieged there, by the Volfcians and fending for aid in duetime, might have been rescued if speed had been made, the army which was sent for fuccour, came too fhort, and after the fray was ended. Only this exp. oit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garison, were gone abroad stragling for to raile booties, were by them overtaken and put to the iword. The canfe of this flackness was imputed to the Senat, rather than the loveraign Tribuns: who because intelligence was I given, that they in the garrison resisted and defended themselves most mansully, little considered,

That there is no prowels of man what soever, but by valour again it may be overmatched.

Most brave and valiant souldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were un-revenged. The year following, when P. and Cornelius both furnamed Coffus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Patitus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unleis they departed prefently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Lars Tolumnins had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, K that the Military Tribuns should propose unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and fending defiance to the Veientians. Which as foon as ever it was noised and published, the younger fort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volki-" ans: that even of late two whole garrisons were loft, and their throats cut, and the forts kept flil " with danger and great hazard. There is not (fay they) a year passeth over our heads, but one field " or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now in-"tended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to "raife against us all Hatruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, "and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more mat- L "ters into their heads, and fet all on a light fire: Who gave out fill, That when all was done, the " greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose were to be toiled our with travel or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: "and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and fent out of the way; left by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should con-"fult and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. "And ever as they could meet with any old beaten fouldiers, they would hold them with talk, "take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to tel-" ling of their gafhes and fears, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to "receivenew wounds, and what blood was behind to fpend and fhed, in the quarrel of the M "Common wealth? When as by iterating these and such like speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and also other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean a way the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the foresaid Act propounded, was put off until a farther day, and lay still for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they flood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battel, parted themselves three ways to waste and forrage the frontires. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetre. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before N them, both house and field, and all to amuse & keep the Volicians occupied that way. But Fabrus without any forraging at all, came directly to affault Anxur, which was the service most defired. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracino, a City feated upon marishes, And on that fide Fabius made shew of assault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala sent out to setch a compass: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town from that higher ground, with a mighty shout and outcry assailed the wall, where it was dissurnished of guard to desend it At which sudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the bale town against Fabius: and suffered them to set ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well those that fled, as those that resisted armed and unarmed, one with ano-O ther. So that, albeit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: because in yeelding they faw no way but one, But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men should be killed, all the multitude besides willingly were disarmed. Of which number there were upon 2500. takenalive, From the saccage Fabius kept the souldiers, until his Colleagues were come: saying, that Anxur was taken as well by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volicians from the defence of that place, as by themselvs. Who being come, the three armies jointly ranfacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time.

A Which courtesse and bountifulness of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and befides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senar decreed, that fouldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber; whereas before that time, every man in that lervice had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, fo joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Councel house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and faid, They were now truly called Patres, i. Fathers, confessing that now the day was come, that in the aparrel of so bounteous a City, there was no man would so long as his breath latted, spare ei-Buther limb or life. Seeing that this commodity they should have to help them, namely, that du-" ring the time that their bodies were imployed, and bufily occupied in the defence of Commonweal, their private estate should stand at one yet and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of "themielves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, nor called for and craec ved importunatly, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy, and made the boon it felf much more acceptable. But the I ribuns of the Commons (who only had " not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and " faid, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles all in general, as they supposed: "that this course and order taken, was at the first fight better then it would be found in the pra-" Stile and execution. For how could that money possibly be made and raised but by levying a tri-C " bute or payment of the people? they were therefore liberal; but of other mens purses. But "admir, or fay, that the rest would bear it, yet those neither could nor would endure it, who " were past war-fervice; and lived upon their pensions and annual salary: who would grudge and " repine, that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain then they had in their time "done; who having been charged with the pay of their own service, should now again be put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Commonalty. Last of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribuns also proclamed, That they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the fouldiers pay. The Nobles continued ftill to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purie, and for that as ver they had no filver coin, some of them carried gross pieces of brass in Wains to the treasure D houle, and made a goodly thew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common fort faw both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and reverenced of the fouldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, refusing the Tribuns assistance, began to strive who should pay first. And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaming war against the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veios, confifting much upon voluntary fouldiers. Now the Tribuns were T. Quintins Capitolinus, P. Quintins Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the lecond time, A. Manlius, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Emylius Mamerous. And these were the first that belieged Veii. About the beginning of which fiege, when the Tuscans held a Councel in a solemn assembly at the Temple of Votumna, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the fiege not so hot, by reason that some of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volician war, The Tribuns Military in Coff. authority, that year were, C. Valerius Positus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Cossas C. Fabius Ambustus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius the second time. With the Volscians there was a pight field fought between Ferentinum and Ecetra; wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribuns began to lay siege to Artena a Town of the Volscians: where, by reason of a fallying forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occasion and vantage thereby, F' to break in with them pell mell, and so they won all, save only the Castle. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castle, many a man was either flain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the sortress besieged also Neither could it by affault beforced, for that there was a guard inflicient to man it, confidering the bigness of the place: nor gave the affailants any hope of yeelding, for before the town was loft, they had conveyed all their publick provision of corn into the Castle. So that the Romans had for very wearifomness departed from thence, but that a bondslave betrayed it unto them; who let incertaine fouldiers at a fleep high place, and those were they that won the fortress: for when the warders were by them flain, the rest of the multitude with sudden fright were soon overcome, and yeelded. Thus, when both the Castle and town of Artena was sacked and spoiled the legions were

G brought back from the Voiscians, and all the Romans power imployed against Veit. To the traitor aforesaid, there was given besides liberty, the pillage of two housholds for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Artena was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volicians: the occasion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Cere and Veins. But that town the Roman Kings destroyed: and it belonged to the Ceretes, and not to the Veientians: but this other, whereof we have reported the defirmation, was in the country of the Volscians. The

The Fifth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fifth Book. A T the siege of Veil, the souldiers had hold made them for to winter in. Which being a new kind of fervices, struck an heat in the Tribuns of the Commons, who complained that they had no ress from warfare, so much as in the winter season. Thenthe Gentlemen of Rome began first to serve upon their I own horfes. When the Albanlake overflowed, a certain Prophet or Wizzardwas taken captive from the enemies, who should interpret that strange wonder. Furius Camillus, after ten years siege, wan Veii : he translated the Image of Juno from thence to Rome. The tenth part of the Spoil and Jaccage he fent to Apollo at Delphi. The same Camillus being Tribun military, whiles he laid siege unto the Falisci, fent back again to the parents; his enemies sons that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Falisci yeelded themselves, and so by his righteom and sust dealing, obtained wittery over them. When one of the Censors C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his placeWhich was never done again afterwards, because inthat five years space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Furius Camillus, being indited by L. Apuleius a Tribun of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senones a people of the Gauls, besieged Chusum, and the Embassadors sent from the Senat to conclude a peace between them K and the Clusines, fought themselves in person against the Gaules in the Clusines army. The Senones hereupon made quarrel, and with a cruel army came against the City of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia, they were Masters of the City, all but the Capitol, into which the able and serviceable young men of the City betook themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state belonging to the offices that each one had born, they flew fitting in the porches and entries of their houses. And when they were now gotten up to the top of the Capitol, by the back fide of the hill, they were discovered by the gagling of Geefe, and were turned down, principally by the valour of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romans were forced to covenant and grant for to give them the fum of 1000, pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the fiege: Furius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an army, whiles thogold was in weighing 1 and drove L the Gauls out of the City, after they had been possessed of it six months, and slew them. A Chappelwas built to Locutius : in that place where before the taking of the City, there was a voice heard, that the Gauls were coming Whereas it was purposed and propounded to remove to Veil, because the City of Rome was burnt and razed: that course by the advice and authority of Camillus was crossed and disputched. The people was moved thereto the rather, by occasion of the omen of a word spoken by a Genturion who being come with his band of fouldiers into the Forum, was heard to fay thus, Stand Souldiers, here will be our best abiding place.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

Hen peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with such mutual malice and hatred; that it seemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to final destruction. The affemblies for the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribuns Military in Confuls authority: for eight of them (fo as never afore) were created : M. Emylius Mamerous the second time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appius Claudius Crassus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius Tullus, M. Posthumius, M. Purius Camillus, and M. Posthumius Albus. The Veientians contrariwise, being weary of sning for dignities every year (a cause sometimes of civil discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Hetruria: who as they abhorred all regal government, fo they hated the person of the King N himself. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his greatness and pride withall: in that he had violently put down their folemn playes, the intermission whereof was held unlawful and detestable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulse, and by the suffrages of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be high Prieft, in the very midst of their tolemn Games and sports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, whereof a great fort were his own servants. That people therefore given to superstition above all other, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same decreed to deny the Veientians their aid, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veii for lear of the King, who would accompted him that should report fach rumor, for a sower of sedition, rather then an author of news. The Romans, albeit O they heard that all was quiet from Hetruria, yet because they were advertised that in all the Diets and Councels of that Nation, the question was on foot and much debated, made their fortifications at Veii, fo as they flood two wayes: fome looked towards the City against all fallies and eruptions of the townsmen: others fronted Herraria, to stop all succours that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long fiege, then in quick affault, began to build wintring harbours (a strange thing to Roman Souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribuns of the Commons

A Commons (who now a long time could find no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the affembly of the people, founding and folliciting the minds of the Commons, and often faying, " That this was the only matter, why a fet pay was appointed "for the fouldiers : and that they were not ignorant, I hat the gifts of enemies would prove to be " beimeared with poison: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and fold: That their "young men were fent away far off, and as it were banished from the City and Common-wealth, " to that now they had not fo much spare time as winter nor any season else of the year, for to vi-"fit home and lee unto their cltate. What think ye (fay they) is the cause of continuing this " warfare? No other verily should they find it but this, left by reason of the frequent number of B" those young men, in whom the whole strength of the Commonalty confisted, there might be "fomething dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and befides they com-" plained how they were much more hardly used, then the Veientians, For as for them, they spent "the winter within their own houses, defending their City, fortified both with goodly walls, and "also by natural fituation of the place : but the Roman fouldiers abode by it fall in labour and "travel, shrouded under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with snows and frosts, not lay-"ing away their harness and weapons, so much as in winter the ordinary time of rest from all wars "both by sea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor those proud and "imperious Confuls (before the Tribuns authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the "Lordly ruling Dictator, nor the infolent and unsupportable Decemvirs, ever enjoined; thus to C. dwell in continual fouldiery, as these Tribuns Military do: who exercise upon the Com-"mons of Rome, an abiolute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when they were Confuls or Dictators indeed, who now but representing only the Confuls govern-"men (as Vice-Confuls) are fo cruel and unreasonable? But we are well enough served, and just-" ly have deferved no leis. For that there was not fo much as one place for a Commoner amongst "eight Tribuns. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three "rooms: and now they go eight in a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of "State and Government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, "to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing eife) that they that go to warfare were free-"men yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondflaves. Who in winter at the leaft, ought to D "be brought again to their houses and homes, and once a year visit their loving parents, their " fweet children, and best beloved wives: to make some use of their liberty, and chuse their "Magistrates: These and such like speeches, whilest they broadly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adversary that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, lest for the purpose at home by his brethren in office, to restrain the Tribuns seditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained up in the broils and contentions of the Commons. Who certain years before (as we have faid) gave shrewd and unhappy counsel to dissolve and put down the Tribuns authority, by the contradiction and inhibition of their own Colleagues. This man being not only in wir prompt and ready, but also exercised by long practice, made at that time this or such the Oration like speech: "If ever doubt were made, O Quirits, whether the Tribuns of the Commonalty have of App. Class. E " for love of your good or their own particular vantage, been always the authors and beginners diss. " of discord and diffention, this year I know assuredly, ye need no more stand in doubt. And as I rejoice ye are at length come to an end of this your long wandring, so I congratulate "both you, and the Common-weal for your fake, that this error is cleared, and especially in the "midft of your prosperity. Is there any man maketh question now, that the Tribunes of the "Commons were not offended, nor took fouff to much at the injuries at your hands received is (if haply there have sometimes been any) as at the bounty of the Nobles, towards the Com-"mons, in allowing pay to those that serve in war? What think ye else, either they feared then, or "would at this day diffurb and disquiet but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which "they suppose rendeth most, and is sufficient, to abolish and overthrow the Tribuns authority. F "And verily, as naughty Artifans or lewd leeches, feek for work fill, and would be ever doing: "fo they likewife defire to have something or other out of frame and amis, in the Commonweal, "that to the repair and cure thereof, they might be ever sent for and emploied. Fo whether do ye "(and speak truth) maintain or impugne the commonalty? Are you the adversaries or the advo-" cates of them that serve in the wars? Unless peradventure this be your saying, Whatsoever the "Nobles do, it milliketh us, be it for the good of the common people, or to the prejudice and er dammage. And even as masters forbid their own servants and slaves, to have any dealing at all "with strangers, and think it meet and reason, that they medle neither hot nor cold with them: "even to forewarn ye the Nobles from all commerce and entercourse with the Commons: to "the end, that neither we by our courtesse and liberalitie, should allure and win them; nor they G " again become dutiful and obeifant to us. How much more ought you(I pray you) if there were "any spark (I say not) of civilitie, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to "favour, and as much as lieth in you, foster and cherish, as well the gracious kindness of the No-"bles, as the willing service and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpe-"tual, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Seignory and Empire, within a while, might "prove the mightiest and most renowned of all those States that border hard upon our confines? "As for this purpose intended, and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have "the army withdrawn away from the fiege of Veii, before the fervice were brought to an end;

"how it would not be only profitable, but also necessary, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now H "forthis time, I list rather to treat and speak of the present condition and state of those, that are "employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, "but also in the camp, and there can vassed and scanned of by the very army it self, I suppose, would "feem equal, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, it nothing elfe should come in-"to my head to speak, I would content my self, and relt satisfied with the only speeches given "out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the souldiers, " for that never belore it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and to male-"content, if they who have some new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain common- I "Iy without travel and employment, Pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most un-"like, yet by a natural kind of fociety (I know not how) are linked together. The fouldier (afore-" time) thought much to beltow his labour & service upon the Common-weal, at his own pro-"per charges: yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home, " husband his land, and get maintainance to find himself and his, both at home in City and abroad "in war, Now, taketh he contentment, and is well pleased, that the Common-weal is gainful to " him and with joy ul heart receiveth his wages, Let him likewife be content, with patience to to forbear his house and family (fince he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordina-"ry, Might not the Common-wealth, if the would call him to a reckoning, juitly fay: Yearly "pay thou hast, perform therefore thy yearly service? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full K "wages for the whole year? and to be employed but fix months for it? Much against my Sto-"mach, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration: for " in this wife ought they to reason that have mercenary and hired souldiers: but we will use "them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they entreat us kindly, and speak unto "us as to their native Country. Either it behovedus, not to have begun the war at all; or elfe to proceed forward, now it is begun : yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish "it with all speed possible. And sinished it will be, if we press upon our enemies thus besieged: "if we depart notafore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veii. And surelysit "there were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignity of the thing, might force " us to continue fiege unto the end. In old time the whole power of Greece laid fiege full ten years 1. "to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how "many lands and feas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 20, miles of our dwel-"ling place, and almost in the fight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years fiege? Be-" caule (forfooth) we have but small cause given us to war: and not griefs enough that might " justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace "never were they true. Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fide-" nats they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slain: and "against all law of nations they were the principal instruments of that unworthy and unhuman "murder of our Embassadors, All Hetraria would they have raised up against us, and at this day " abour it they go. And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have M " run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at a bay " and to war coldly and by leasure? But if so just an hatred as this move us not: do these things ((I pray you) nere awhit move you neither? Their City is environed and beleasuered with deep a trenches : blocked with mighty sconces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his "own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by " war. If we dislodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for defire " only of revenge but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having lost "their own) wil invade and over run our country? So that by this means we defer not the war, "but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly "indeed concerneth fouldiers (of whom our good Tribuns of the Commons would now in all N "the halte feem to have to great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wrested their wa-"ges:) but what is that (I say?) A trench they have cast, a rampart and platform they have raised, " (matters of exceeding travel and labour) to far about: sconces at the first a few, but after as "their army encreased, they have erected very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not "only to command the town, but also looking toward Herroria, to impeach any relief, if any aid flould from thence come. What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the man-"tilets and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoiles, Rams, and all other " engins of affault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after so great toil and pains taken, now that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be lest and abandoned, that " against summer we should be new to begin again, and sweat afresh about the same? How 0 "much less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instant, and con-" (fant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For furely we may "foon dispatch the service, if it be plyed throughly and followed on still without stay; and if we "ourseives by these intermissions and respits between, make not a long piece of work of it, and "draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loss of time. What else? Considering "these so many Parliaments, these Diets and Councels continually in Tuscany, about sending aid to Veil, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the War? Indeed (as things

A "now presently stand) I confess the Tuscans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and "deny to fend: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the fame mind? Seeing that if the "Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to send oftner their Em-"baffages, and those more honourable than herecotore. Also the King who newly is set up and "created at Vein (the only thing that now offendeth the Tutcans) in process of time, may be chan-"ged for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of " the Tuscans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should " be hurtful to the fafety of his subjects. See how many things, how many inconveniences fol-B" low and enfue upon that course and manner of proceeding. In loss of the fabrick and fortifi-"cations, with so great labour already prepared and archieved: the imminent and present wasting " our own borders: the Tuscans war instead of the Veientians. These your devices, Oye Tri-"buns, are much what like to his, that offering a fick mantome kind of meat or drink, for the "very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palat and to content his taste, maketh his dif-"ease long, and peradventure incurable; who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at once, he would have resolutly endured the right cure of a skillul Physitian. And surely, if it "were not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to martial "discipline, that our souldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet fruit of a victory "archieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tedioniness; and to wait for C " the end of their hope, be it never to long; and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for win-"ter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for housing, "harbour and covert. Confider, I beteech you, and fee. The love and pleafure of hunting carri-"eth men into mountains, woods and forrests; through frost and snow, after their game: shall " not we then use the like sufferance in the needful exploits of war, which pastimes sports, and de-"lights, are wont to draw and fetch out of us? Think we the bodies of our fouldiers to effeminate, "their hearts fo tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear "their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would "blush and be abashed verily, if a man should therewith charge them: and they would stand slifty D " in this, and avouch. That they had both in body and mind manlike sufferance and patience and "that they were fouldiers as well for winter as fummer: and that they fet not the Tribuns awork "for any patronage of cowardile and shelter of id.eness : but remembred well enough, that their "forefathers were not under shadefor fear of sun-burning, nor had their houses over their heads " for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribuns. This rather is "beleeming the valour of your fouldiers, this fitteth well the name of Romans, not to have their "eye upon Veii only, and this war now in hand, but to feek for fame and glory both by other "exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would enfile "hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazzard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nati-"ons confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a City could receive their E "first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it need not after to sear any more; Or 66 rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and neer. That "no wearisomness of long siege and assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raise the Ro-"man army from any town once by them invested? as knowing no other end of war but victo-" ry? and whose manner of service is not by way of violent force more then of obstinate continu-" ance, which (as in all other military occasions) so in besieging of Cities is most needful: the greateft number wherefo, being either by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural fituation impregnable, yet by samine, by hunger and thinst, process and tract of time only doth force and overthrow. As it will (Idoubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribuns of the com-"monalty succour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which F "they feek in vain throughout all Hetraria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians fo "wished for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp (as "it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariyise I assure you, amongst "the enemies, so good order there is and government, that neither the redioniness of long siege, "nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any stir or commotion among them. No nor the "denial of help from the Tuscans hath one whit troubled and diffempered their minds but "die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man there be suffered to "speak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling. "He deserveth the bastanado, to be dry beaten and wel cudgelled that forsaketh his Colours, or "departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open affemblies, they that perswade and G " couniel not one or two fouldiers, but whole armies to leave their Standards and Enfigns, and "abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Insomuch, that what soever a Tribune of "the Commons speaketh, although it were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, yeare " nied to hearken and give good ear to him: and being ravished and carried away with the sweet-" ness of that authority, ye suffer under it to lurk any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth now "no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might "iterate in the camp among the fouldiers, to corrupt the army, and not fuffer them to obey their "Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence

"nor yet the Discipline of Military fervice. Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: But see; (a thing that no man would have thought) a loss and foil received before Veii m de App us to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent defire to affail Ven more hotly, and to befiege it with more resolution, For when they had raifed up a mount neer unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and roofed mantlets, whiles (Ifay) they were not so vigilant in the night feason to tend and watch these Fabricks, as they were buse and earnest in the day time to rear and plant them; behold, all of a sudden the enemies opened a gate; and armed in great I numbers, especially with burning firebrands, let all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour confumed both the mount and the manilets, which had colt fo long time in making. And many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life, Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and lad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and stay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting left that the Tribuns would have infulted over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so assessed, and had no horses of service affigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves, suddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with horses of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them K most gracious words, the newsthereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a sudden the Commons came running unto the Councel house, faying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweal extraordinarily without mustering, whether they should be led, either to Veii, or to any other place what loever. And if they were conducted to Veii, they would not return again (they fay) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators so exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praifed by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Councel house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Councel house I. door. But every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: faying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesse and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wept again who could weep most, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree was made, That the Tribuns Military should afsemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country: and to fignifie that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service so willing- M ly, should have their pay notwithstanding : yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Veii, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army fo well delerving of the Common-weal. The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Confuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginius, Q. Sulpitius, A. Manlius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time, In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, thefort of Anxur being neglected, by occasion that the garrilon souldiers were disbanded and N ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volician Merchants into the town, was suddenly surprised, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Less company of souldiers there were flain: because that all of them (besides those that were sick) found themselves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawless lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better success at Veii, wherein rested the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angred one at an other than couragious against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were encreased by the suddencomming of the Captains and the Falleii. Which two nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Veii should be forced and lost, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Falifcians besides, upon a special grudge and old quarrel of O their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermedled and interessed themfelves, fent their Embassadors to and fro, and by binding themselves by a folemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Veii. And by chance they affailed that fide and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a sconce, Who gave a great alarm and caused exceeding fright: because the Romans supposed certainly that all Herraria was raised out of every part, and there present, with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veientians also within the City, to make a sally. So was the Camp of

A the Romans assailed on both sides. And whiles they ran together up and down, and turned their ensigns every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the strength of their fortresse, nor yet repulse the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themselves from their forraign enemies behind: their onely hope was to have help from the greater leaguer: that the legions in fundty places might make head, some against the Capenats and the Falifes, others against the fally of the townsmen. But Virginius had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice against Sergius, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and bulwarks were assaulted, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both fides charged luffily, kept his B fouldiers well appointed in arms: faying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleague should fend unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not fo arrogant and infolent, but the other was as peevish and wilful. Who because he would not feem to feek unto his adversary, nor crave aid at his hand, chose rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them for a good while the poor fouldiers went to wrack, and were slain. At the last, for saking their ramparts, a very sew of them escaped into the maine camp. But the most part, with Sergins himself, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginius (hould be fent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenants (hould command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a C taunting and reviling: and many hard tearms were dealt between them. Few there were that tendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the I.L. of the Senat thought good, howfoever that fo shameful chance hapned either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains, not to expect the oxdinary full time of the election, but that prefently there should be new Tribuns military created. dinary that the on the teachers, the state of October, To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gainfaid it. But Sergius and Figurius (for whole fake it apollows) peared that the Senat was weary of the Magistrates that year) at the first made means & belought them not to difgrace and difcredit them for and afterward affayed to crofs the decree denying that then not to ungrate and untrain the the soft of the so D of entring yearly into new offices. Amid this buliness, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept filence even against their wills, so long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City prospered, upon a sudden brake out and threatned sharply the two Tribuns Military, that unless they would submit themselves, and rest in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward, Then C. Servilius Hala, a Military Tribun, stood up and faid, " As for you and your threats, "O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly fee once, that there were no more " power and authority in these here, then will and stomack in you, But who seeth not that there is nostriving against the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear "you to feek opportunity and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren for "their parts shall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or else if they shall continue E" flubborn fill in their contumacy, I will presently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave "their office. This speech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magistrates: the two military Tribuns aforesaid, were overweighed with the content of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the * Calends of October: and before that day they refigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Potitus the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the second time, M. Emilius Mamercus the "1. day of third time, Cn. Cornelius Coffus the second time, C. Fabius Ambuftus, and L. Julius Tullus, Tribuns October. military in Confuls authority.

In whose time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not onely F they had war in fundry places at one time, namely, at Veii, at Capena, against Falerii, and with the Volsci, to the end that Anxur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome alfo, what about musters and paying the tribute for fouldiers pay, there was much trouble Besides, there was some variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the rest: and the two arraignments of those, who a little before had governed in Confuls authority, caused no small ftir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the muster should go forward. Neither were the younger fort and ferviceable men only prest forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of fouldiers, so much more money they needed for their payment. And the same was levied by a contribution : but unwillingly of as many as tarried at home. For that befides the levy G they were enjoined to become fouldiers also, in defence of the City and to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things, grievous as they were of themselves, so by the seditions Orations of the Triburs in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and discoursed thus, "That wages was appointed for souldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, "and what with exactions and impositions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of "them at once for ever. One war (fay they) hath now continued three years, and the same, on " let purpose, illmanaged, that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one muster there were "armies enrolled for no fewer than four wars, whereunto beardless boyes and old crasie men, "were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or fummer: fo as the H "poor Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and racked to the " uttermoft, so that after they have brought home with them their bodies overtoyled with travel, "weakned with wounds, and last of all, wasted and spent with age: and finding all things at "home unhusbanded by reason of the long obsence of the masters and owners, they must be sain "to pay tribute even out of their poor decayed quick flock, and repay again with great usury to "the Common-wealth, their wages received in war, as it were upon interest,

Between the musters of one side, and the levy of souldiers pay on the other side, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, I there should be some of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow * the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to pals that they should assume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Attilius, by the might and practice no doubt of the Patritii. It hapned, to that the same year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would feem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duty to that name and house belonging. He spake aloud and said, "That "whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof some of the Nobles had born the repule

The investive "in their first suit, and that the Law Trebonia was disamuled, in that certain Tribuns of the Com-"monalty were taken into their fellows, not by suffrages and free voices of the people, but by the " rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that pais, that either K Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that "their facred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wrested from out "of their hands by violence: all these inconveniencies he complained to have happed through "the fraudulent practife of the Nobles : and the mischievous lewdness and treathery of his own « companions in office. Thus whiles there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but also the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Curigiius, M. Metilius, and Minutius fearing some threwd turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Verginiu, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by ferving process, giving them a day to anfwer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the Commons, upon those two persons: I publishing openly, "That whosoever were grieved for the musters and the Tribute, whosoever thought the war long, and the continual fouldiery tedious, who oever for rowed for the "dammage and discomfiture received at Veii, whosoever for the loss of their Children, Bre-" thren, Kinsfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful houses: to them they offered "liberty and power to vent their publick and privat grief, upon their two guilty persons and of fenders, Sergins and Virginius, the very causes of all the michies and calamities that were hap-"ned. For why? the adversary charged them with no more then was confessed by the very par-"ties: who finding themselves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whiles Virginius ce reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treaton to Virginius his charge, in that "he denied his help in time of need. For to fay they were both of them fo inconsiderate and M 66 foolish only, were to speak beyond all compass of belief. But much more likely it was, that there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practifed of set pur-" pole, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patritii. By whose means both at the first the Veientians gat opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and pro-"long the war, and also now the army was bought and sold, and the Roman camp betrayed to "the Falifei. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax " old at Veii, and that the Tribuns might not propose and consult with the people about the di-"tribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full " affembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withfland the conspiracy of "the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (fay they) a prejudice passed against these N offenders both by the Senat and people of Rome, and also by their Colleagues. For as they " were displaced and deposed from their office, by an Act of the Senat : so when they refused to "give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to refign up their "government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their "charge, not upon the usual day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Ca-" lends of October: as who would say, the Common-wealth had not been able to fland any lon-"ger, if these men had remained still in place. And yet for all this, these persons thus convicted "and fore-condemned by so many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking "they are sufficiently quit, and discharged, yea, and have suffered punishment enough, in that "they were two months fooner then ordinary, made private persons; and perceive not, that 0 "thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no punishment inflicted up-"on them. For as much as even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewise " discharged as well as they; Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heartto "them again, which they had upon the late overthrow, fresh and bleeding new, when they be-6 held the army running in fearful flight, fore wounded and agast, arriving at the gates, bla-"ming no fortune, not any of the gods, but only these their two brave leaders. And as forus,

Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger "and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they " should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand "themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it sufficeth that they arm the wronged and oppres-"led persons withmeans and opportunity of revenge. B happy, and speed worseat home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon theletivo, obscured and darkned the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforelaid, and of deluding and difanulling the Law Trebonia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a present reward for awarding this doom, publish the Law Agraria, and forbid the levying of the Subfidy for fouldiers pay: feeing there was need of pay for fo many armies: and fped fo well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any wafring at all. For at Veil the pery camp which was loft, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks, and furnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Emplius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Furius in the Falifcan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenat Country, they could

C meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drave away booties, and wasted their mar, hes, by fixing their villages and their corn : but as for their towns, they neither affaulted nor beneged them. But in the Volician country, after their territory was walled, Anxur also was affinited (but in vain) for that it was fituate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, feeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay fiege to it, and invelt it round. The affairs of war abroad standing in these tearms, there arose domeftical strife and sedution at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater ado, than the wars were managed without, And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no inbiidies and exactions be gathered, nor money for fouldiers pay fent to the Generals, and that the fouldiers called onthem hard, and were hafty for their wages: the camp also had like to have D been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angry fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people said, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Screii and Virginii, to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were to make entrie and take possession in the right of that dignity to wit, P. Licinius Calvus, thould be created Tribun Military with Con- P. Licinius Calfuls authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Tivinius, P. Melius, L. Furius was the first Medullinus, and L. Popilius Volfeus. The very Commons themselves marvelled that they had obtained to great a thing, and not he only who was created, a man that aforetime had never been foveraign grade in place, and born no magistracy, yet anancient Councellor of State, an elderly person, and well vernment.

E stept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to have hanfel, or make effay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his fake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through savour drawn in, and called to so great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very wel, concerning the agreement and unity of the States. The Tribuns of the Commons rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the subsidy or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof paiment was made in all dutiful obedience, and fent it was unto the army. Then within fort time was Angur (in the Volicians F Conntry) recovered: by occasion that on a festival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and inowy winter, fo as the high ways were choaked up, and Tyleris was unnavigable; Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in aforehand, the price of corn arose nor. And for because P. Licinius, as he entred his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles; fo also ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the next election also, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Veterise, of all the Nobility that flood in fuit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Confular authority, all the Centuries in a manner chose Commoners, to fuddenly changed to a contrary, or upon some other hidden and unknown cause there followed prefently a contagious and dangerous fummer, by occasion of a pestilence, notion to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reason could be found, nor any end thereof feen, the Books of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senat perufed; and Dunmvirs appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Lectifiern (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appeale and pacific Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Neptune; feasted them(as it were) for the space of eight days together, & for that purpose they fer out three beds or banquetting tables, with as magnificent and stately surface as could be for that H time possibly deviled. Which folemnity was privatly also performed. All the gates and doors through the CityHood wide open:al forts of viands were fet out abroad to be used in common open house kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown strangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcom, and entertainment, Kindly, and courteoutly would they talk and devile, even with their adverfaries: all chiding and brauling was laid afide and put under foot, The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea, and conficience made afterwards, that any should be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchfafed that gracious meed.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Veii, by reason that three wars were joyned now in one. For when as all at once the Capenats and the Paliici came (in ma- I ner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans Jior to refene the horizoneged, they were forced to make head, and hazzard a doubtful battel against three armies. But the best help they had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginius. Therefore having conducted by a neerer way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lay fill and would not come to inccour) they fet upon the Capenats backs, as they turned against the rampart of the Romans. The battel there begun, made the Falifei also afraid : in which affright of theirs they suddenly sallied out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear. And having got the upper hand, they followed the train of the victory, and in the chale made a very great flaughter and destruction of them. And not long after, the forragets that wasted the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, K encountred the residue and remnant of this battel, as if sortune of purpose had presented them to their hands, and swept them up clean. Also many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates : whiles they within for fear left the Romans at once should rush in, made the gates falt and so shut out the hindmost of their own men. These were

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who saw now that the soveraign rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but welneer on their own behalf quite loft. Therefore albeit of fer purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suit, whom to pass by and let slip, they thought the people would have been ashamed : yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they L had been the parties that flood) tried every way, and not only fought the help of men, but also craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great scruple and a matter of conscience : and alledging that the elections for two years past were not according to the wil of God: as appeared by this, fay they, that in the former year there was an intollerable winter, and such asportended some heavy judgements from above; how also the year following, there were no prodigious tokens shewed aforehand, but even the very events and effects thereof, were seen and felt: namely, the peftilence both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that pestilent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religioufly to be held the gods thought it an indignation and unfeemly thing, that M the Lonorrable offices of state should be made common: no distinction of degrees, no difference of horfes obsered, but all consused and shuffled together. The people therefore being driven into amaze, not only in regard of the Majetty and Dignity of those that were competitors, but also of a very remorte of contience, chofe for Tribuns military in Cost, authority, all of the Nobility and a goodpart of them, the most honorable personages of the rest, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Cam llus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third tine, Quintius Servilius Fidenas the second time, Quintus Sulpitius Camerinus the second time. Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy of record, was performed at Veil under these Tribuns, All the service that was, confisted in forraging and wasting. The two Lord Generals raised huge booties, to wit, Politus from Falerii, Ca nillus from Cazena: leaving behind them nothing N whole and untouched that might be spoiled by fire or sword. In this mean time many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that of each there was but one only author:and because there were no soothsayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (fince that the Tuscans were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especially there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban forrest, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing seem less miraculous and wonderful, was risen unto an unusual height. Certain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods forefignified by that prodigious token. But they, as god would, met with an interpreter of the Destinies neerer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian Who (upon a time, when as the fouldi-0 ers, both of the Romans and Tuscans, let fly one at the other taunts and scoffs from their stations and guards) thus spake in prophetical wife: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban poole, the Romans should never be masters of the town of Veii. Which saying of his was at the first contemned as a soolish word rashly let fall from him: but after, it began to be much talked of, folong, until a certain Roman fouldier, from out of his ward, enquired of a townsman that warded next unto him (for now by reason of long war they had entercourse of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake?

The Alban lake rifen to a wonderful height,

A When he heard that he was a fouthfaier, being himfelf also a man not without some sense of religion he trained that wifard forth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be refolved himfelf, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind . & therefore requested himat his good leitare, to take fo much pain as to confer with him, and give him counfell about the ex piarjon and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and suspition one of the other, the Roman being alufly tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the fight of them all, and not withflanding a great flir that the Tulcans made but all in vain had him away perforce to his own company; Who being brought before the General, was fent afterwards to Rome unto the Senat And being de-B manded what the me aning of that should be, which he had prognosticated and presaged concerning the Albanlake, answered thus: " Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Veii that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatall and inevitable destruction of " their State and country: and therefore that, which as then he being ftirred by divine infpiration se had prophefied neither might he call back again and unipeak; and belides, happily by conceal-" ing those things; which the immortall gods would have to be published, there might be commitof ted as great fin, as by disclosing mysteries to be conceased. Thus therefore (quoth he) is it written bestructie "ten in the fatall books of fortunes, and thus in the Tufcans learning, to us is delivered, That when on of Veil. the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it outs they Should have the victory of the Veientians : but before that the gods would not for ake the wals of the C Veientians. Then went he on fill, and shewed what was the solemn and right maner of deriving the water. But the Nobles supposing authour to be the light of credit, and not of sufficient account in to weighty a matter to beleeved, resolved to expect the Embassadors, and the answer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before these messengers were returned from Deiphi, or any expission found out for this Alban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Confuls authority, L. Julius Tullus, L. Furius Medulliuus the tourth time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Post humius Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, A. Manlins; began their government.

In that year there arolenew enemies, the Tarquinians; they feeing the Romans busied with many wars at once, with the Volicians at Anxer, who laid fiege to the fort there : with the Equians at Lavices, who affaulted the colony of the Romans: belides, with the Veientians the Fa-D lifeians and Capenats and that within the City there was no greater quietness, by reason of variance between the Nobility and Commons . supposing, I say, that hereby they had good opportunity to do some injury and harm, they send forth certain bands of souldiers lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to forrage and make spoil-thinking that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new war : or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender and disfurnished. The Romans was more offended at the indignity of these bravadoes, then they cared much for the spoil done by the Tarquinians. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while. A. Posthumius and Lu. Julius levied a power without any ordinary muster (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a man-E ner of voluntary fouldiers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable foeethes. And passing throughout the country of the Carits by cross & crooked waies, surprised the Tarquinans upon the fudden, as they returned from plundering, & laden with great prizes. Many they flew, all they eased of their loading and thus having recovered the spoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. Two daies were allowed for the owners every own to own his proper goods: & on the third day, such goods that were unknown (whereof the most part belonged to the enemics) were fold in port-fale: and that mony which was made thereof was divided among the fouldiers. All other wars, and especially the Veientian, had doubtfull iffue. For now the Romans despairing of ail mans help, regarded and expected only the course of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embaffadours were retuned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wisard, with was taken priloner : and it ran in this forme : Be- The answer of ware O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Bewear thou let it not the Oracle. discharge it self into the sea. Let it forth and wtear the fields therewith, by sundry rivulets or fireams thou shalt wast it and draw it dry. Then assault valiantly the enemies wals, remembering that out of that City which fo many years thou haft besieged, victory is promised to thee assuredly, by those destinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and conquest atchieved, see thou bring unto mytemple, an ample and honourable present : andperform thefacred ceremonies of thy country according to the old custome, and renew those a fresh which have of late time been neglected. Here grew this captaine prophet above faid to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribunes military, Cornelius and Posthumius, began to take his counsel and G advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appeale the gods indue order. And found it was at last where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient folemnities and facrifices: and that certainly it was nothing elfe, but that there was an errour committed in creation of the Magistrats and they so created had solemnised the Latine holidaics wrong and celebrated the facrifices in the Alban mount amifie. The only purging or expiation whereit was, that the Tribunes military should give over their office, and that the y should take new Auspices againby the flight & singing of birds, and so to proceed to an Interreign. All which things were according to a decree of the Senat performed. Whereupon there interregents succeeded one after another. M. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, M. Farius Camillus, But all H this while no end there was, nor intermission of troubles and distentions. For the Tribunes of the Commons disturbed and staid the assembly for the election to long, untill it wasagreed that the greater par of the Tribunes military should be created from the Commons.

During these affaires, the Tuscans held certain Diets and Councels at the Temple of Voltumna: where when the Capenats and Palifei required that with one common affent and refolution, alt the people of Hetruria should raise the siege from Veii, this answer was returned : "That here-" tofore they had denied the Veientians their help in this regard, that they were not to feek for " aid at their hands, from whom in to weighty a matter they had not fought for counfell: but now "their own fortune made answer for them. For such was the difficulty of their present estate, I "That if they would, yet they well could not : confidering especially how into that part of Heet turis there were newly arived to feat themselves there, the Gauls, a strange nation unto them: 46 with whom they neither had affured peace, nor yet certain war to trust unto Howbeir for bloud-" fake, and for the very name, and in regard of the present perils of their kinimen, they would agrant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of them-er felves, they would be no bindrance. Now was it noised at Rome, that a mighty great number of their enemies were come to raise the siege. Whereby the civil discords of (as it is commonly feen upon a generall fear) began to wax more calm and to flake. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their first voice, choic P. Licinius Calvan Tribune Military, without his own fult (but not against the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderati- K on in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the rest for that year, should be choien anew after him, out of the Colledge of those that had been Tribunes Consular beforetimes: namely, L. Titinisus, P. Menenisus, (n. Genntisus, L. Attilius : who before they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinius Calvus spake in this manner (by the permission of the Interregent) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right and orderly course, to their suffrages." I see well, my masters O ye Citizens of Rome, That in this election, wherin ye have The Oration in remembrance our former Magiltracy, ye gueffe and prefage happily against the year ensuing, of Lizinias Cale as concord and unity: the only thing at this time of all others most profitable: in case I say, you may not be see. wm to the peo. " chufe again, those who by experience also are become now more sufficient. But as for me, you " fee I am not the same man I was but a bare shadow and name only is all that is left of P. Liel. I. " nim. The strength of my body crasie, and feeble, the sense of my eies and ears dim and dull : er my memory faileth, the quicknesse of my spirit grown heavy and lumpish. But behold (quoth et he, laying hand on his fon) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom ye afore time made Tribune Military, the first that ever was out of the commonalty. Him trained and to brought up after my own order and discipline, in stead of my self, I bequeath, I give, I dedicate unto the commonweal And I befeech you O Quirites, that the dignity which of your felves you schave offered unto me, without my feeking, you would bestow upon him at his own humble fuit, and the rather shew him this favour at my earnest request in his behalf. The father had hisdefire granted. And io his fon P. Licinius, was with them, whom before we named, declared Tribune Military in Confuls authority. Titinins and Genntins Tribunes Military, made an expedition M against the Falisci and Capenats; Who managing the war in greater heat and courage, than with lage advice and counted, plunged themselves headlong into an ambushment of their enemics. Genneins paid for his rafinnesse, and made amends by an honorable death : For he was flain even before the enfignes, valiantly fighting in the vanguard of the battell with the formoft. But Titinus, having after much fear rallied his fouldiers, retired himfelfunto an high hill, and made head again. Howbeit he durft not encounter the enemy on even and plain ground. The shame of this defeat was greater than the losse otherwise. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the fear, not at Rome only, whither much news came diverfly reported ; but also in the camp before Veii, that hardly could the fouldiers be kept from running away. For it was noticed all over the camp, that the Capenats and Falifeians had got the vi- N ctory, flain the Generals and the whole army and that all the flour and ftrength of Tutcany was not fat off. But at Rome there was much more hurli-bury: For there it was verilybeleeved, that the leaguer about Veit was affaulted, and that, part of the enemies already were coming in warlike maner against the City : so as they came running on heaps to man the wals. And even the very mattons and dames of the City, whom publike fear had caufed to leave their houses, fell to their beads and supplication in the churches a befeeching the gods to avert and divert destruction from the houses, Temples, and wals of the City of Rome, and to turn away that fear from themupon Veiit if they renued aright their festivall daies, if they made satisfaction by sacrifice for the prodigious fights, and no otherwife. Now by this time were the folemn plaies & the Latine holidaies renewed, now was the water O let out of the Alban lake into the fields, now Veis drew neer to her final end, halfned by the course of the Destinies. Therefore there was created M. Furine Camillus Dictator, the fatall captain, predestined to destroy that City, and to save his own country : who appointed P. Corneliss Scipio Collonell of the horimen. The change of the General made a change foon of all things elie. The hopes of men were other than afore, the minds of men were altered, yea, the fortune of the City feemed not the same. But first of all, he proceeded by martiall law against them, who in that fearfull

A fright at the last alarm, were fled from Veis: and taught his fouldiers not to fear their enemies most, but like wife to frand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take musters upon a certain day, himself in the mean while rode post to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the fouldiers. From thence he returned to Rome, forto levy a new army and there was not one that refuled to lerve under his ftandard. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hernicks, came & offered their fervice in that war. Unto whom, when as the Delator had in the Senar houle yeelded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readinets, by a decree of the Senat he made a vow, that when he had won Veri, he would incontinently celebrat the great games, and reedifie and confectat anew, the Temple to dame Mainta, which afore time had been dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his army on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope . first he fought a field with the Faliscians and Capenais in the Country of Nepei, [called at this day Nepe] where he ordered all the exploits with as great diferetion and policy as might be and as it commonly falleth out he feed as well and fortune, favoured his delignes. He not only defeated his enemies in batell, but also drave them out of the field, and gained a huge booty, whereof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers; and somewhat (though not much) was given to the souldiers. From thence he marched with his armour to Veil, and there he caused more sconces and bastillons to be made, and to stand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight withour speciall commandment, he withdrew the fouldiers to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skir-C mithes that they made oftentimes, and that rashly, between their camp and the wall of the town. The greatest work of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Castle of the enemies. And to the end that this work should not be intermitted, nor yet the continual! labour fill under the ground might over-toil them : he divided the pioners into fix parts, as d each of them wrought fix hours round by tures, fo that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Castle. The Dictator seeing now the victory as it were in his bands, and a most rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be such faccage, as never bad been the like in all the wars put together aforetime: left that he might incur either any mutiny and anger of the fouldiers in pinching and teant parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontenument of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by to prodigall a largesse in sharing all; dis-D patched his letters to the Senat, to this effect, " That wheras by the goodnesse of the immortali Gods, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his fouldiers, the City Vois was now in s a maner at his devotion; what they would advite, should be done with the rich spoils thereof. There were two divers opinions that mightily diffracted the Senat: the one of the old P. Lieimin, whole mind being asked of his fon, fpake first (by report) and laid: that his opinion was, there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whosever would be partaker of the booty, should go to the Leaguer before Veii. The other of Ap Claudius, who finding fault with this new prodigall, unequali, and undifereet largeffe, in that they thought it unlawful and unfit, that the treature got of the enemies should come once at least wife to the common purie of the City, which had been emptied to often by reason of wars: was of advice, "That the foul-E et diers should have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be cased, in the Difference in of charges of the fublidy levied of them : for fo should every mans house equally feel the fo-"ciety and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle persons remaining at home in the town gree- lage of Veil. dy now of rifling, and who would be fingering of Pillage, should not plack from the hardy et warriors their due rewards. For as much as it is usually seen, that as the valiantel man "commonly aimethat the greatest part of travell and perill, so the more coward alwaies reacheth at the biggest portion of the spoil, and hath his hand deepest therein. Contrari wife, Lie cinius, alledged that such mony laid up would be alwaies suspected and odious, and would mi-" nifter matter unto the Commons of criminations & finding one fault or other, whereof feditions and commotions may arise, and would give occasions of new laws to be preferred: and there-F "fore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and reconciled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of their charges of so many years, herewith "might be well relieved. And that they ought to tast the fruit and sweetnesse of the booty out "of that war, in which they had ipent their years, and were waxen old men. And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, and with " his own hand catch from the enemie what he could, and bring it home with him, than if they er should receive much more by a great deal at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the "Dictator him felfe (faith he hath avoided as neer as he could, the displeature, hatred, and offence "that might arise thereof, and therefore polled it off to the Senat : the Senat ought likewise fe feeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to G " have such share as the fortune of war will allot him. This advise which made the Senat grati-

"ous with the people, was thought to be the fafer and better of the twain. Whereupon procla-

es mation was made, That who to ever would have part of the spoil of Ven, should the whinselie

" before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after facrifice done; and advice taken of the lucky figures of birds.

went forth and commanding his fouldiers to take armes and weapons in hand, fpake thele words

"and faid : " By thy conduct and the inftinct of thy divine power O Prebins Apollo, I let forward to the winning of the town of Veit, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the I poils there!

The City of

Veij won by

The fifth Book of T. Livius. 64 And thee withall (8 Queen June) who at this hour doft inhabit within the compafie of thefe B "wals, I befeech, that thou wouldft vouchlafe, to follow us after conquest into this city, ours "now, and thine within awhile. whereas thou maieft be shrined in a Temple meet for thee, and "the grandent of thy majetty. Having made these praiers, with an exceeding multitude he invested the city, and affaulted it round on all parts : to the end that they within might have lefte perceivance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that iome of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoil and saccage, and other by vowes and praiers trained and called out of their own city, began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations: little weening that this was their laft day, & fearing nothing leis than that I their wals should by undermining be overthrown, and that their Castle was full already of enemies: every man for himself ran armed to the wals, marvailing what the matter should be, that whereas for to many dates space no man stirred out of the Romans Leaguer, then of a sudden (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head to rafhly to the affault. But hereto belongeth a tale; That when the Veientian King was at facrifice, this voice of the Southfaier was overheard out of the mine under ground, That he whose hap was to cut forth the inwards of that sacrifice (hould obtain wiftery, and moved the Roman fouldiers, to break out of the undermning, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of to great antiquity, it sufficeth me, that thole which carry tome likelybood oftruth, be received for true : to for fabulous matters fitter indeed to make a thew in a stage play (where people take delight in such miracles) K then to be fadly beleeved, it will not quit for the pains either to avouch them, or disavow them. The mine or cave at the fame time (no doubt)full of chofen fouldiers, yeelded forth all at once atmed men into the Church of Juno, which was in the castle of Voii, and some of them set upon the backs of their enemies that were on the wals . others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: fome of them, whiles from the houles the women and fervants flung down ftones and tiles, cast fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that frighted others, and partly of those that were affrighted, with a confused screecking of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed fouldiers were thrown down from the wals every where, and the gates let open . whiles some entred marching in aray, others scaled the naked wals, the city was filled with enemies a and skrmithes there were in every place. After great mat- 1 facre and execution committed, the fight began to quail and the Dictator commanded the Bedles to proclame and give commandment, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloudsbed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yeeld: and by permiffion of the Dictator the fouldiers ran to the spoil. Which being brought in fight of the Dictator, of greater price and value a good deal, than either washoped or looked for a it is faid that he ftretched forth his hands towards heaven and praied, "That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any "god or man to be excessive, the envy belonging thereto might be mitigated with as small "p: vat loffe of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of "Rome in generall, as might possiblybe. And it is recorded, that in this maner praying and worshipping, as he turned himtelf about, he slipt forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards M guefied by that which fell out, it was supposed that the ominous token presaged the condemnation of Camillus himfelf, and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be forced and lacked. Thus was that day ipent in the flaughter of enemies, and in rifling of that most wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator fold in portfale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That mony only came into the common treasury not without fome anger and repining of the Commons, And as for that booty and spoil which they brought with them away, they counted themselves beholden therefore, neither to the Generall himself (who to colour and excuse his own nigardife had referred the matter to the Senat: wherein he might have used his own liberty and diferetion) nor to the Senat : but unto the house of the Licinit, whereof, the fon propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of fo popular an over- N

When as now worldly and earthly riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the facred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the maner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean washed, and being arraied in robes, had in charge to carry Queen Juno to Rome, and entred into the Church with great adoration and reverence: and at the first very charily and religioufly laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuscan maner) there used none to handle that I mage but the Priest of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certain divine inspiration, or in some youthfull sport, cast outthese words, Welt thou march to Rome dame O Inno? Therest with one voice cried aloud, That she gave a nod, and seemed thereto to give asfent : whereupon this also was added to the tale, that the was heard to fay, I will. But for certainit is reported, that the was ftirred out of her footstall, with the help of a small lever, and that as the willingly was displaced, so the was easily removed & translated, and so fafe and found conveied into the mountain Aventine, there to abide and remain for ever; which was the place affigned unto her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillan according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the finall end and fall of Peis, the richest City of all the Tuicans, which even in the laft and atmost calamity shewed her mightiness, and having been believed tound about continually the space of ten turniners and winters, & in that time done much more annoisnee and hurt then it received, was now at last through the necessity of fatall deltiny, gained rather by long slege and secret undermining, then won by forcible assult and violence:

When tiding came to Rome of the winning of Ver, albeit both the prodigious lights that were feen, had been expire by facrifice, and that the answers of the Prophets and wilemen, yea, and the Oracles of Apollo were well known : and that fo far forth as mens counfel and policy might help, they had cholen for Generall M. Farim, the most noble captain and warrior of all other: yet confidering they had there warred to many years with variable fortune, and received many loffes and overthrows, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had hapned unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that suplications should continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any war. The Dictator also was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and effaces in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man afore time, to that day. And the triumph far exceded the ulual maner of the lolemnity to that day belonging. But most of all wis he himself all goodly to be seen, entring into the city in a chariot drawn with white fleeds. And that was thought an honour, not only inmeet for the quality of a citizen, but hardly befeeming the condition of any man whatfoever. For they made it a matter of confeience, that their Dictator should be equall with Jupiter, and the fun, in The temple respect of their hories : for whichonly cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gra- of Queen In C crous, and taken in good part. Then affigued be & fet out to Queen Juno a church in Ancentine hill, no, The temple and dedicated another to dame Mainta, and to having atchieved and performed those divine and of Mainta. human deeds, he religned up his Dictatorship.

After this began some speech about the Present to Apollo. Unto whom, when as Camillas said that he had vowed the tenth part of the spoil and the Priests and Prelats thought good that the people should discharge their conscience in that behalf: there could no ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the spoil, that the due portion thereout might be let apart for the holy colation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the easiest course of all that who foever would acquit himfelf and his house in confcience, should, after he had made an eltimat to himself of his own share in the spoil, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the D common Cheft : that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the state of that Temple, beteeming the power of that god, and answerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillan.

A mid these affairs there came Embassadours from the Volscians and Equians, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with continual wars, might now take rest and be at quiet, than for any deserts of them that sued for it. After Veij was taken, the year following had fix Tribunes Military in Confuls authority, two P. Cornelij, namely, Coffus and Scip.o. M. Valerius Maximus the second time C. Fabins Ambustus the second time, L. Furius Medullinus the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Unto the Cornelin fell out by lot the Faliscan war, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenats. Who neither affaulted their cities by force, nor E wearied them with fiege ; but forraged the countries, and drave booties away of such things as were in the fields, not a tree that bearethfruit, not any fruitful things belides, escaped their hands. This diffresse and calamity subdued the Capenats . who thereupon sued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the Faliscians the war continued still. In the mean time, at Rome there were fundry feditions. For the appealing whereof, it was thought good to fend a Colony to Volfei, and thither three thousand citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Triumvirs were thereto chosen, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be despised, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their months withall, and to put them beside agreater hope. For why should the Commons be sent away into the Volscians land, feeing there was Veij within their eye-fight, a molt fair city, and the land about more plen-F tifull and large than that of Kome ? And as for the city it felf, they preferred it, either for the fite, or state of privat or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General transmigration and removing to Veij for ever. Marry they intended that Veij (hould be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility : faying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities joyntly in one state of Commonwealth. Against all this, the LL, of the Senat labouted what they might, and plainely faid, they " would sooner dye in the fight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should passe. For why? if there were now in one city fo much diffention, what would there be in twain? Would s' any man be so mad, as to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered "the tame ? and inffered Veij after it is won to be in better eltate then it was afore, even when "it was at the bell? Finally, well might they be forlaken at home in their own country by their citi-"zens, but to for ake their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force what-" foever. They would not follow to Veij, T. Sicinini as their founder, for he amongst the Tribuns "of the Commons perferaded this Act) and leave their god Romains the ion of a god, the first Stockfather and beginner of the city of Rome. Whiles these matters were in handling with foule flir and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion toine of the Tri-

Tribunes) there was nothing elfe that staied the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that when there was an outery made to begin the quarell, and to fet them together by the ears, the chiefe and principal Senatours first came forth to the multirude, and offered themselves to be laid at, imitten and flain. In regard of whole age, dignity, and honour, they forbeating to do violence, were likewise for shame staied in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camillus taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and faid , "Thatit or was no marvell truly, that the city was in a rage and madnes, which being charged with a vow, Made more care of all things elfe, then to discharge their conscience thereof, and see it performered. As for the collation and gathering of a small donative, rather then a tithe, he faid nothing of it : feeing that every man privatly bound himfelfthereto, and the body of the people flood freet ed therefrom. But one thing there was that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace, that out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levideds as for the city and ground that was won, which also was comprised within the vow "there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senar feemed doubtfull and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelats : their colledge calling to them Camiller, thought good, that whatfoever the Velentings had before the vow made, and whatfoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof fhould be conicerated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued : and mony taken forth of the city chamber, And the Tribunes military Confular en joyned therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not flore enough, the dames of the city, having their affemblies and meetings by themselves " for to confult therabout, by a common decree made promife to the Tribunes military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was as facceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been ; and for this liberality (men (ay) they had this honour granted unto them, as to ride to church and to plaies in hanging or hip-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidaies, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight and prifed to the worth, that they might again be paid mony therfore: it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made therof, and presented as an ob-Sation to Apollo at Delphi. So foon as they had eafed and disburdned their minds of this religious yow, the Tribunes of the Commons began ledition anew. So as the multitude was incited and firred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillus, charging him, that what by con- I fifcating and confectating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were absent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were prelent in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so foon as they faw the matter in question to be deferred and continued past that year, they chose again for the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that act and law. The Nobles likewife endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the very same again, But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patritij after very much ado got at length, that Parisa Camillas was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a Generall for war, but indeed their purpole was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand M the ads and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camilius were made Tribunes Military in Confuls authority, L. Furing Medulinus the fixt time, C. Emplius , L. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Postbumius, P. Cornelius the second time.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M.Farins Camillim was gone against the Falifei, as his charge required for that war. And by delaies afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their advertary, he waxed great and glorious, by his fervice against the Falisti. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the wals, thinking it the fafest way : he by wasting their country, and fetting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to betoo bold, and to go far forward : and encamped themselves a mile and leffe from the town; N repoling their fafety and (ecurity in nothing elfe, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the waies all about being rough, ragged, and frony, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and freen, Camilius having tak en a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, shewed himtelf upon the higher rounds a good deal. The Romans on three fides, fell to fortifie by trenching and casting rampiers, whiles the rest of the army stood ready ranged for the batrell. And whereas the enemies affaied to hinder the work, he discomfitted them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falifei were fo frighted, that as they fled amain in dilaray, they paffed beyond their own camp, which was neerer; and made as falt as they could to the town. Many were flain and many wour ded, before that in this aftright they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, O the booty thereof came into the Questors coffers, with the great gruding and anger of the fouldiers. Howbeit yeelding to the feverity of discipline and good government : the fame virtoe which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city befreged, and iconces and platforms raifed about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townimen would fally forth and affaile the Romans camp, and make light skirmilhes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side : for that they within the town belieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they that lay at fiege without. And it feemeth they would have had as long a peece of worke there as they had at Veij, had not fortune yeelded to the Romans General, both a trial of his approved vertue in war and also speedy victorie.

It was the manner among the Faliscians to entertain for the government of their Children one that should teach and instruct them in ichool, and withall bear them company whereforeer they went; and many children together (as the guile continued ftill even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the Nobles and principal mens fons of this City (asit isulually every where elfe) a speciali man had the teaching of them, such an one, as was thought molt learned and the greatest clerk of all other. This man, having in time of peace B begun to bring the children forth before the town fide, to disport and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And using still to train them abroad one while neerer, an other whiles further off from the gate : it fell out fo, that one day what with paftime, and what with pleasant talk and discourses, he drew them further then he accultomed; and feeing his time, went forward as far as the enemies corps de gard, and to forth on, till he had brought them within the compaffe of the camp, and even to Camillus his pavilion. Where to his wicked intended act, he added also a more gracelefte peech, laying, "That he yeelded " Falerij into the cone. "Romans hands, in that he gave them those childrento do with what they would, whose parents were the rulers and commanders of the city. Which words when Camillon heard, thou comell not Camillos to the "(quoth he)lewd wretch as thou art, with thy lewd and curfed prefent, either to a people or to a traiterous " cantain like thy lelfe. We have not indeed with the Falifcians any league at all, by covenant of ichool mafter C "man concluded and established yet by mature, there is and will be still a kind of amily priorio of the Noble-"ety between us and them. There are laws due for war as well as for peace; and those have we men fone of "learned to observe no designishly, than valiantly. We bear arms not against that filly age, which "falsi" " usually is spared in rasing and sacking of sowns, but against armed men, and those who being "by us neither harmed nor provoked, have affailed the Romans camp at Veij. And yet those ene-"mies (as bad as they be) like as thou halt for thy part exceeded them in a new and ftrange kind of " wickednesse : to will I conquer I doubt not, by feats that the Romans professe : by vertue, by " travell, by hardy fight : like as I have done Veij already. After this he caused him to be stripped naked and to with his hands bound behind him, he delivered him to the children, for to bring him back to Falerij : and gave them rods withall, wher with they might whip and drive this traiterous D person forward into the city. At which fight the people at the first came running together : and then the Magiltras called a Councell to fir upon this strange occurrent. But see what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred and anger to cruelly set, as that they wished rather in a maner to be destroied with the Veientians, then to accept of peace as the Capetrates had done; now through out the whole city required to be at accord with the Romans. No talk in the Market place, no speech in the Councel house, but of the faithfulnesse and truth of the Romans, and of the justice of their General!. And with one generall confent of all, Embalfadours were tent to Camillan, into the camp. And from thence by permiffion of Camillan to the Senat of Rome they went, to deliver up Falerij : and being admitted into the Senat house. in this wife (by teport) they fpake:" In that victory (right honourable) which neither God nor E man can chute but alloware we by you and your General overcome and vanquished. And here we The Oration man can chuic but allow, age we by you amo your Octical overcome and variquinted, Addition of the Embalia-render our ideves into your hands a impossing this (than which to a conquerour there can be no- of the Embalia-render our ideves into your hands a impossing this office and the constraint of the control of the Embaliathing more honourable) that we shall live better under your government, than under our own proto the Senat per laws and liberties. The event & issue of this war, bath afforded to mankind two worthy examples to follow. Ye for your part have made choice to observe faithfulnesse in war, rather then to atchieve a prefent conquest: and we again, by this your faithful dealing induced and provoked, " have willingly yeelded unto you the victory confessing our selves now presently to be your liego " & lawfull subjects Send whom you will to receive our armor, our hostages, our town with open " gates. Neither shal you ever repent of our alleagance nor, we think much of your rule & government. Camellus had thanks both of the enemies and of the citizens. The Falilci were charged F with muny for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their subfidy. Thus when peace was granted, the army was brought back again to Rome. When as Camillus was returned after this conquest of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than when as intriumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white hor es through the city, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulneffer fecretly the Senat was abashed for very reverence of the man, and could no longer bear, but without further delay to acquir him of the vow he made. So there were lent L. Valerin, L. Sergius, A Manlins as Embassadors in one galley unwafted, to prefent unto Apollo at Delphi by way of obligation, a standing cup of gold. Who not far off from the narrow leas of Sicily, were encountred & borded by certain Liparenfian G pirate or men of war, and had to Lipara. Now the maner was of that city, as common rovers nice to do) for to divide the prize among them. Haply the chief officer or Magistrat for that year, was one Timafithess, a man more like to the Romans than his own countrimen. Who having himfelf fome reverent regard of the name of Embaffadours, and the prefent of the god to whom it was fent, and the occasion thereof: posselsed the multitude also (which also rightly resembleth their governor) with due religion and prick of conscience. This head ruler brought the Embassadors into their logding, & entertained them courteoully at the cities charges, wasted them with the convoy of a fufficient fleet : accompanied them in person to Delphi, and from thence conducted them home again fale to Reme. Whereupon by an act af the Senar, there was a contract made with H him of smity and mutual entertainment, and gifts beflowed upon him at the cities coft. The same year there was doubtfull war with the Aquians, fo it was uncertain both in the army and at Rome Whether they had won or loft the victory. The Generals for the Romans, were of the Tribunes Military, C. Emplim, and Sp. Pofthamim. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfitted, it was agreed, that Acmyl. in should keep Verringe with a garifon, and Posthumine wast the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently with his army out of order, as prefently after field won, the Equians fet upon him, and having put him in fear chaled him to the hils next hand. The fright whereof came from thence to the other garrison also at Verrugo. Posthumius, after that he had retired his men into fatty I and affembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their fear and running away: and that they were discomfited by a most dastardly sugitive enemy t the whole bolt cried out with one voice, that they deferved to be told of it, and conteffed that they had committed a foul faultabut they themselves would make amends therefore; and promifed that the enemics should carry it neither to heaven nor hell, nor joy long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them prefently to the enmies camp(which in fight was pight upon a plain) protelling to refuse no extremity of punishment, if they were not mafters of it before night. He then commended them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to be ready at the reliefe of the fourth watch, Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romans, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Verrage, And before day they encountred together (but you must think the moon shone all night) and saw how to sight, as well as by day K light. But the noise being beard to Verrage, firske to great test amough them , thinking the camp of the Romans had been affailed, that for all Armylius could do to hold them, and to beleech them to the contrary, they fied feattered unto Tufculum. From whence the news came to Reme, That Post hamine was flain, and his army loft. But he riding about the host (after that in the morning betimes the day light the wed them that followed apace on every fide, that there was no fear of ambushments and forlayings) charged them with their promises, and let them in such a hear, That the Acquians could no longer abide their violence. Then flew they the enemies in the chair every one, and made havock of them as they fled, more like men that do things a in fury and rage then by plain valour. And prefently from the Tidings from Tufeulum (which put the city in a vain& causeless fright) there came from Postbamin letters, dight with lawrell; importing news, that the L

Romans had the victory, and the Aquians the overthrow. Because as yet the actions and sates aforesaid of the Tribuns of the Commons could come to no end but the Commons laboured to continue the Tribunethip in them that were the maintainers of the law preferred, and alto the Nobles endeavoured to make those rulers again that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their own Election prevailed and had the better : to the Nobles were revenged of them againe for this griefe they tooke, by an Act of the Senat, that Confuls (hated Magistrates of the Commons) should be created. Thus after fifteen yeares were Confuls reelected, L. Lucretinu Flavun, Servim Sulpitim Camerina.

In the beginning of this year, when as the Tribunes of the Commons bestirred themselves stoutly to go through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to deny and nip the M. iame : and whiles the Confuls for that very canfe refifted them as earneftly, and the whole city was here about amufed : the Equians won Vitelia, a Colony of the Romans, feated within their own country. Most part of the Coloners (because the town being by night betraied and won, yeelding unto them free passage to escape away on the back side) fled fafe to Rome. So that fervice befell unto L. Lucretim the Conful; Who went with a power and vanquished the enemies in fight, and with victory returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deal. Anias Virginim, and Quist as Pomponias, two Tribunes of the Commons the two years past, were accused a for whose defence it was for the Credit of the Senat, That the Nobles should agree and flick close together. For no man laid to their charge either difhonest behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themfelves in their office, but only this, that to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had fet themselves N against the Tribanes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senst, and (that which was a molt fhamefull precedent) they/guildeffemen) had fine fet on their heads of * ten thousand pound of brasse coin; Whereat the Nobles took great displeasure. Camil-Ins openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part: who now fetting themselves against Lethite Com- 4 their own pations, perceived not that by a perverie proceeding in judgement against their Tribanes, they had loft their liberty of opposing themselves with their negative voice : and take that away once, and farewell all authority of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped "that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licentious liberty of that office, they were much "deceived: for if their hard courfes of the Tribunes might not be restrained by help of the same "Tribunes, the Nobility would find some other weapon to fight withall. He rebaked the O " Consuls also, for that they suffered those Tribunes to faile of their protection and safe conduct, " who had done and faid nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senat. Whiles openly he used to make these and such orations to the people, he throst himself daily more and more into mens anger and displeasure. But to flir up the Senat against the forciaid law, he ceased not ftill: willing them, that when the day came of proposing the law, they should come into the Common Hall, with no other mind but this, to remember they were to fight for god and coun-

A try, for the temples of the gods, and the very foile wherein they were born. And as for his own felf privatly, if it were lawful for him amidft thele civil troubles of his native country, to "think upon and respect his own proper glory, it were right honourable for him, to have the city "which he had won, peopled and relorted unto : and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable " monument of his own glory : to fee before his eies the very City, whereof the counterfeit was "born in the pomp of triumph : and that all men elle should tread in the steps of his noble acts. "But he thought it a shamefull and abominable thing, that a City left and forfaken of the immor-"tall gods, should be inhabited : and that the people of Rome should dwel in captive foil, and to "make this exchange, to leave a naturall country which bath conquered, for it that bath been con-B " queredWith thele perswasions & exhortations were the chief rulers excited, the Nobles old and young, came in multitudes, (when as the law should be propounded) into the Hall. And as they were dispersed and forted into Tribes, every one taking hold of those of his own tribe, began to befeech them even with tears, not to forfake that Country now, in the quartell whereof they and their fathers had fought most valiantly and happily : shewing herewith ever and anon the Capitoll, the Temple of Veft a, and other Temples thereabout of the gods: that they should not therefore drive the people of Rome, as exiled and banished out of their native foil from their own home and housegods, into their enemies City, nor bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Veii had not been won, rather then Rome should be abandoned. Because their dealing was nothing but by way of praier and perswasion, and in their praiers much mention and naming of the gods, C the most part of them were touched in conscience : so as more Tribes nipped that one law forgoine forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victory was fo joyfull to the Nobles, that the morrow after, by the motion of the Coff.a decree was made, That amongst the Commons should be a division of seven acres for a man out of the Veientian lands : and not for householders only, but that confideration and reckoning should be had also in every house of all free born perfons: to the end, that they should be willing to breed up children to the like proof, and for the hope of like commodity. When the Commons by this bountifull gift and liberality, were well pacified and falled, there was no ftir at all to hinder the election of the Confuls. So there were created Confuls, Ln. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was furnamed Capitolinus. These Consuls set out the great solemn games and plaies, which M. Furins, the Dictator had D vowed in the Veientian war. In the same year the Temple of June Regina vowed by the same Dictator and in the same war, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great refort and forward endeavour of the dames of Rome. War there was (but not greatly to be poken of) Algidum with the Equians, for that the enemies were in a maner discomfited before that they joyned battel. Valerim because he followed still and killed the enemies in chase, was allowed by decree to triumph at full : and Manliss, that he should enter into the city only Ovant, in petty triumph. The same year arose a new war with the Volicians: against whom by reason of a samine and pestilence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought and heat, an army could not be led forth. For which cause the Volscinians puffed up with pride, joyning unto them the Salpenates, invaded first the country about Rome. Whereupon war was E proclamed against both nations. G. Julius the Censor departed this life. In whose room M. Cornelia was substituted. Which after bredfome scruple of Religion, for that Rome in that five years space was taken. So that never after that is there any Censor chosen into the place of the deceased; And the Confuls also being fick and thereby disabled to govern it was thought good to take new counsell & advice of auspices or tokens of birds, by an Interreign. When as therfore by an act of the Senat, the Confuls had refigned their office, M. Faring Camillus Was created Interregent. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio: and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Potitus to be Interrex. By whom were made fix Tribunes Military with Confuls authority : that in case any of them should be fick and craffe, yet the Common-wealth should have governours enough. The first day of Jan ly entred they into their office : namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulpitius, M. Aemylius, Lu Furiw. Medullinus the seventh time, Agrippa Furius, C. Aemylius the second time. Of these L. Lucretius and C. Aemylius had in commission to go against the Volscians : but Agrippa Furius, and Servius Sulpitius against the Salpinates. And first were the Volicians fought withall. A great war in relpect of the number of enemies s but for the conflict and battell, nothing fierce and tharp. For their army at the first encounter was put to flight, and eight thousand souldiers were by the Roman horsemen environed, whereupon they threw their weapons away and yeelded. The tidings of this war caused the Salpenates not to adventure upon fight but they kept themselves armed within the wals, and ftood upon their gaurd. The Romans then all abroad drave booties both

The fame year one M. Caditius a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes that in the new Canfey, where now there standeth a Chappel above the Temple of Vefta, there was in the still time of the night a voice heard, louder than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gauls were coming. This, by reason of the batenesse of the author (as commonly it is seen) was not credited : belides, they were a nation far remote, and therefore lefs known and of small accompt. Thus were not only the advertilements of the gods despiled, when as their fatal time of de-

This nation (as it is reported) allured with the fweetnesse of corn and wine especially (daining aid against the Gaules. ty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been aforetime by the Tuicans inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Arani a Clustine, who had brought wine into Gaul, to entife that people withall, upon an anger and dipleasure that his wife had been defloured by one Lucumo (whose guardian Arun; himselfe had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Arun; could not chattise and brishes) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom dle, without affiltance of forrein forces: This man was the Gauls guide in paffing over the Alps, K and the principal instrument to let them awork for to assault Clussum. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Classian by draws or some other Classiae . but most certain it is, that they who affaulted Clustum, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two bundred years before they affaulted Classian and won the City of Rome, came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Tuscans, but long afore, and that oftentimes, with those that dwell between Apennius and the Alps. For, the Tucans had all soveraign command, both by land and fea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of appear and nether fes, wherewith Italy is compassed about, as it were an Island, may be a suificient proof, how great and puillant they were a feeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called of great and puillant they were a feeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called of great and puillant they were a feeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called Adria. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italy, thus much we have learned. In the daies of Prifess Tarquinius King of Rome, the (c) Cesses which are athird part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the (d) Bisurs. M ges who choic a King over the Ceites, named Ambigatus, a great potentat and mighty, both in regard of valour and vertue, and also of his own privat wealth and publick weal; for that under his regiment, Gaul was fo fertile of corn, and grew to populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and defirous now to diffurthen his Realm of that peltering multitude, declared that he would fend Bellove fur and Sigovejus his filters ions (two forward young men) to feek adventures, into what lands foever the gods and goddesses should by their token direct them : giving them commission to gather what number of mentbey would, to the end that no nation might withfland their coming. So it fell to Sigo vefas lot, for to enter the forrelt and woodland country of Hercinia. The Clasines terrified withthis new war, advising well both their number and the unaccustom-

Aid they obtained cone : Embaffadors there were lent three, the fonnes of M. Fabins Ambuftin, who in the name of the Senat and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and perswade with them, notto set upon the conrefederats and friends of the people of Rome namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong : faying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, The Romans were to defend (Gauls by war, howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all : but that the them a new come nation thould grow into knowledge and accquaintance, rather by peacethan so by war. The embaffage was mild and mideft enough, but the Embaffadors themselves were over of fierce & halty, and more like Gauls than Romans; Who having done their melsage in the alsem- The answer of bly of the Gauls, were thus again answered. "Although the name of the Romans was but of late the Gaulstothe of heard of yet they, yet they were perswaded that they were hardy men, at whose hands the Embassadors Cinfines in their fear, longht and requelted luccour. And whereas they choose rather to defend of Rome. o their allies by way of embaisage, than by open war, they likewile neither didained nor reful d peace which they offered : It the Classines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) as a part of their marches, whereof they held in polseffion more than they did well people and acse cupy : Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer whiles the 6. Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the ce Romansface, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other s men in valour &chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to requite ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interreft or title had the Gauls in Tufcan ye They sgain frontly made answer; that they carried their right in their swords point, and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both fides to let on fire that they ran to their weapons & skirmillid with the Tulcans. Then against all law of nations (a thing that halfned the destruction of the Roman City) the Embassadours took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the enlignes of the Tulcans, there were feen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight fo far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clufines. Moreover and besides, Quinius Fabius riding out of the barrell on horseback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the ensignes and battel of the Tuscans, ran him through and flue him: and as he rifled and difarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassadour of the Romans. So, leaving their quarrell aganst the Clusines, they lounded the retreat, and threatned the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome ; but the elder fort prevailed, that there should be sent Embalsadors sirst to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yeelded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadours had declared their message according to their commission, the Senat nothingliked of the Fabians deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit fait of friends and privat respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requifit. Therefore to the end it might not be imputed to them & they blamed, if peradventure any toil or overthrow should hip into them, by war-ring with the Gaula: they referred the hearing and discussing of the Gaula demands unto the peo-ple. Where might and favour so much prevailed, that even they who were in question to be puni-shed, were created for the year following Tritusies Military in Confals authority. At which the G Gauls being offended (as good caufe they had) with open threats and menaces of war returned again to their company. There were with the three Fabis P. Sulpitius, Longus, Quintus Servilius, the tourth time, and P. Servilius Maluginenfis. When as now fo great danger was towards and neer at hand (see how fortune blinded mens eies, when as the will have her fway and not be hindred) that City which against the Fidenat & Veient enemy & other nations bordering therby, tried the utmost help, and oftentimes made a Dictator now being threatned with a strange enemy never heard of before, coming to war upon them from the Ocean fea, & the farthest parts of the world, fought neither for governor nor help more then ordinary. Even those Tribuns by whole raft

dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all sand made no more choise, nor multing H of fouldiers than usually had been in common wars: making but a light matter of it and of no confequence, & fetting little by, and elevating the rumour of the war. The Gauls in the mean time (having heard, how on fet purpofe those breakers of human law were soon advanced to honour, & how their embassage was deluded and dallied with, all on fire, as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outragious) pluckt up their flandards forthwith and marched with all expedition on their volage. At whole notice and hurliburly (as they passed by in such hast) when as the towns thereby were put in fear, and ran to their weapons, and the country peafants fled away : they with open mouthgave out and fignified, that they went to Rome. All the way as they jornaled, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they took up a mighty room in their march. But what with the fame that went before, and the messengers of the Clusines and of other people that followed one at the heels of another, this speedy coming of the enemies brought right great test and terrour to Rome. For not withflanding, that they went with a power of men in all half fuddenly mustered, hardly met they them at eleven miles end, where as the river Alia tunning down from the hils of Crastuminam, with a very deep channell (not much beneath the highway) dischargeth it self into the Tyber. And now by this time the whole country before them, and all the coalis about were overspread with the enemies. And (as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein born and bred) with an hideous and diffonant kind of finging (like a black Santus) they filled also about with a fearfull and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Military without getting aforehand a convenient place to pitch their tents in, without fortifying the same with any trench K or rampiers, whereunto they might fafely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at leaftwife they should have been mindfull of, if they had forgotten man, without Anspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by lacrifice, full unhappily and in an ill hour, ranged their battels divided into wings, for fear of being compatid with multitude of enemies. Yet might not the vanguard antwer the breadth of the enemics, not withftanding they made their ranks and files to thin, that the middle ward of the battell was weak, & leant joyning close together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to beflow men for inpply, which as it gave the first occasion of fear and running away, so was it the only lafery of them that fled. For Brennes the Duke or Prince of the Gauls, fearing exceedingly in that small number of the Romans, some stratagem, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept, That when the Gauls should have encountred with the forefront of the legions, then the refeues would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, diplaied and advanced his flandards against those in referee a nothing doubting but if he had once driven them from their hold apon higher ground, on the plain he foould foun have the victory, confidering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not only luck, but policy also on their fides! Contrariwife, the Romans in their camp were nothing like themselves, either for captains or souldiers, Their minds were so possessed with fear and thinking of running away, and so forgetfull besides, that the greater part of them chose rather to flie to Veis, (their enemies City) although the Tyber were full in their way, then to take the streight course to Rome, to their wives and children. For a while, the advantage of the ground defended those that were for rescue : but in the rest of the holt, to foon as they that were next, heard the shout from the sides, and those that were farthest off from behind, before any stroke strucken, and before they were once touched, they fled from their unknown enemie, in a manner before they faw him. And so fat off they were from trying fight, that they answered them not so much as with a countershout again. So as there were not any sain in fight. But they were killed behind at their backs, even by occasion of their own selves, who with their hurrying hindred one another in their flight. About the bank of Tyber, whereunto the whole left wing was fled down, and had flung away their weapons, there was a great flaughter, For many of them that could not fwim, and were weak by reason of their weighty corselets and other harnesse, were drowned and swallowed up of the surging whirlpools. Howbeit, the most part escaped afe to Veis. From whence they came to Rome, not only no succour to guard the City, N but not fo much as a messenger to bring news of this their overthrow. But from the right wing which kept farther from the tiver, and the more under the hill, they all went to Rome. And finding not to much as the gates of the City shut, they all fled into the Castle. The very Gauls themselves aftonied at to wonderfull and fudden victory, flood still at the first in a great amaze, as who know not what had hapned, and wift not what to make of it. Afterwards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the ipoils of them that were flain, and to lay all their armor and harnesse upon hears, as their maner is. At last, seeing no enemy nor shew of bostility, they put themselves in their journy forward, a little before funfetting, and marched to the City of Rome. Where, upon word brought by the foreriders, that thegates were not flut, nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the wals, they flood in the like amaze as before, upon fo ftrange and wondrous o a thing. But fearing the night and the fituation of a City unknown, they fet them down, and refted between Rome and Anie, having fent their espials and scouts about the wals and gates, tousderstand what their enemies meant to doe in so desperata state. The Romans, for that a greater part had taken their way to Veii, then to Rome, and weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled back to Rome; bewailing and bidding adue, both to those that were deand thole alive, fet the whole City almost a weeping and lamenting. But afterwards the publickfear altonied them, and took all fenfe away of their privat forrows, when they heard

A once that theenemies were come. And within a while, as these barbarous people coasted and ranged about the walls by troups, they might hear their yelling, their houting, and uncouth, confused hideous cries. So were they held all the time in suspence of mind, untill the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first coming they would have surprised the City, for unless they had so meant, they would have tarried (they thought) at Allia still again, a little before inn-setting (because the day was well-nighdone) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they teared that they deferred this enterprise untill night was come, to the end they might firike a greater fear &terror amongst them. And last of all the day light approaching, altonied them clean: so as they were in a continual agony, even until the mitchiefcame indeed which they so long B doubted & that now the bloudy banners of their enemies were displaied before their gates. Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the City in the like fear, as when they fled fo fearfully at * Allia. For being past hope that the City could be defended with so small power as re- cominate vel mained, they determined that with their wives & children, all their ferviceable youth, fuch as were Rio de Moffo. meet to bear arms, yea, and the more able men, and strength of the Senat should retire themselves Leandro. into the Castle & Capitol: and after they had thither brought their armor and corn, from thence as from a defensible place to protect their gods, their men, and the Roman name: to fave from fire and sword (so far as they could) the Flamin of Jupiter, the vestal Nuns, and sacred images, and holy reliques of the City and not to abandon the worship and due solemnity unto them, to long as any were left alive, to do them honour and worship. For thus they conceived, That if the Castle & Ca-

Cpitol, being the feat of their gods, if the Senat, which is the head & chief of their publike counsel, if the hardy and fighting yong men remained after that imminent ruin and fall of the City, the lefs would be the loss of the aged tolk, a number, (God, wot) lest behind of purpose in the City, no otherwiselike but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common fort might bear this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Confuls, openly gave out and faid, That they would live and die together with them. Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to bear armour, and to defend the City, surcharge and pester the company of able and armed men, in this their penury & want of victuals. These and such like were the confolations and comforts of the ancients among themselves now resolute to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and lufty men, whom

D they followed into the Castle and Capitol, recommending unto their manhood and to their youthful courage, all the estate remaining of that City, which for the space of three hundred and threescore years, had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom rested all hope and help were departed, and had taken their leave of them that resolved fully not to survive the winning and destruction of their City: as the very thing in it self, and the sight thereof was a lamentable and woful spectacle unto them, so the pitious weeping of women, and their uncertain running up, and down, following now after one, and now after another and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what fatal deftiny they betook them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any sarrhly creature. Neverthelels, a greatfort of them, accompanied their friends into the Calle, and no man either bad or forbad them. For al-

E though it was good and commodious for the belieged, namely, to diminish the number, and discharge themselves of the seeble multitude, yet it seemed unto them an inhuman and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, and could not possibly be kept in so great scarcity of corn & victuals, departed by heaps out of the City: and marching as it were in one company together in a row, took their way to Janualum. From thence they divided themselves fundry waies. Some slipt into the fields and country, some to the next Cities there bordering, without any Captain, without any common consent every one following his own hope, his own head and wit now that all publike counsel was in despair, and past remedy. In this mean while, the Flamin of Quirinus, and the religious Vestal virgins leaving the regard of their own private affairs, consulted with themselves what sacred Images to carry with them, and

F (feeing their strength would not ferve to rid away and fave all) what to leave behind them, and what place was meetest to bestow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrels or rundlets, & within the ground to bury them in a little chappell, standing next to the Flamins house: which place for very devotion unto this day, may not for any thing be spit upon. All the rest they parted amongst themselves. And every one carrying her own burden, took the way, which over the wooden bridge leadeth to Janiculum, Upon the alcent or rife of that hill, when L. Albinus (a Commoner of Rome) five them going, as he among other company (which unmeet for war, departed out of the City) carried his wife & children in a wain: he making even then in that hard calamity, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the publike Priests with the facred

G Images of the people of Rome should go on foot, whiles he and his were seen riding at ease in a wagon, caused his wife and children to alight and come forth, and set the Nuns with their holy Images in their room, and brought them to Care, to which place they minded to go. All things now being fet at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the Cafile; the aged persons abovesaid being returned to their houses, waited for the comming of the enemy, with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had born offices of the chair, to the intent, that they might end their daies in the ornaments & robes of their former estate and honour, and according to their vertue and deletts: in their most stately gaments and habiliments, H which they wear when they carried their facred chariots upon feftival daies, or wherein they rode in triumph, now lar upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and prescript form of prayer to that purpose. The Gauls both for that now they had refled from fight a whole night, and to their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloudy and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any affault or force, entred the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Collina, standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of I affemblies, calling their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the carlle, which only preferred some shew of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, lest haply from the Castle and Capitol they should be violently affaulted, after they were once alunder parted, they fell to raniack and rifle and meeting none at all in the void firects, some rush by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were further off, supposing them at least wife to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again (as frighted by reason of such delolation, and fearing left haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandred one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the marker place, and the places near therto, Where, when they saw the Commoners houses saft shutto & locked, and contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doub K ted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the shur. And they beheld as it were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certain ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houles, who bender their ornaments and apparel, above the ordinary eflate of men, for a certain majefly which they carried in their countenance and gravity of vilage, refembled the gods. And when as they firmed to them, & flood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and facred Images, M. Pappring, one of them, when a Gaul began to froke his beard (which then they used all to wear long) with his ivory hafe (as they say) gave him arap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon he was the first that was murdered, and so the rest were all killed as they fat in their chairs of state. After this massacre of these honourable personages of the Nobility, they fell upon all the reft, and spared no creature they rabiacked their houses; and L when they were empty, let fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them defrom to defroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terrour there should be seen some states (if haply for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mol-burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mol-lifie their enemies, and make their hearts to relent; howfoever, I fay it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a generall havork. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City sull of enemies, and in every free the castle, seeing the City sull of enemies. running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and mileries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and sprint, no, nor so much as to have the right use M of their ear, and eyes. For to what place foever the fronts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the railing and cracking downfals of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune fet up aloft, as upon a ffage or feaffold, to behold the fall and min of their Country: referred to fave nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miterable and pitifull above all others that ever were befieged. in that being thut out from their native Country and City, they were befieged and beheld it; and all that they had in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was spent followed there a better night. Yea Ewhen after this troublesome night the like morrow was come, there was no time but ministred still some heavy object: and one spectacle or other of new and steff calamities. And N albeit they were loaden and over- whelmed with fo many miferies, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but refolved fill, notwithflanding they faw all fired, all ruthate and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked little hill which they treld, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedom. And now feeing the same desolations daily happen they were fo innred to mifery, that paft all fenfe and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs, and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewife for certain dates, had made war with the poor houles only of the City, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, to conquered nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all fo many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once enclined to yeeld without fur o therforce and violence were used; they determine to try the utmost, and to make an assaule upon the fortreis. So on the morrow morning very early at found of trumpet, all the whole multitude of them arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shour, under a fence of targets over their heads; they approach the Caftle. Against whom the Romans behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fear ully, ftrengthning their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guard against all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed,

A that way they opposed their strongest guards: and suffered the enemies to climb up the hill, suppoing that the higher they were got up, so much the easilier they might be beaten down. And being come up to the midt of the cliff there they said and then e from the higher ground, which of it self in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and fent them down headlong: fo as never after that, e ther any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of service. Being therefore past hope to get up by force and arms they make preparation for long fiege: whereof until that time they had no mind both for that the corn which was within they had confumed in burning of the City, and in the mean pace, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Veii. Whereupon they divided B their Army, purposing with one part thereof, to forrage and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoyning, and with the other to invest the Castle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corn to serve them that lay at the siege. Now as those Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camidus abode in exile) there to make triall of the Romans valour. This Camillus being more pensive in the behalf of the publike calamity, than carefull of his own : spending his spirits and wasting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himself, and wondring what was become of those valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Veis and Faleris, and who had fought other wars more valiantly alwaies than fortunately : of a sudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear fell to confultation thereabout what to do: and ceven as if he had been inspired from God above, he put himself forward and entred into the midst of the people assembled, who heretofore, had abitained and forborn such publike meetings and consultations. And thus he said: "You my Masters of Ardea, mine old friends sometime, The Oration "and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for so it is fallen out by your kindness & de- of Camillus in " ferts, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think, that I, forgetfull of mine own the Affembly eftate am come forth hither into this audience. But the present object and publike danger for-"ceth every man to utter and bring forth in so fearfull a time and business as this is, what help he "can, And when shall I ever be thankful unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I stand "ftill and do nothing? Or where shall I ever stand you in stead, if not in war? By my skill herein, "I flourished in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neigh-D" bours and unkind Citizens banished. And now have ye good occasion offered, and opportunity (Oye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those so great pleasures and curtesies in "times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves do well remember, (and therefore be "it spoken without upbraiding and reproaching of any mindfull persons) and also to win great "honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy unto both. This nation, which "thus cometh towards us with a diffolute and difordered army, are those to whom God and naer ture hath given bodies more big and corpulent than strong and able, hearts more stout and cou-" ragious than constant and resolute: whereby they bring with them alwaies into the field more thew of terrour, than true valour and execution. Whereof, the late foil and discomfiture of the "Romans may be a fufficient proof and triall. They won the City when the gates stood open unto E "them: a small power from the Castle and Capitoli was able to withstand and repell them. And " weary already of the tediousness of siege, they are fain to depart, stragling up and down, and " wandring along the country. Their manner is when they have filled their bellies with wine and "good victuals, (which they devour fullgreedily and hastily wheresoever they can come by it:) " fo foon as night cometh on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward to lay them-" selves along like bruit beasts, here and there by the waters sides. And now upon their good suc-"cels, are they more secure and retchless, than they were wont to be. If ye be disposed to defend "your wals, & not all to turn French, gather your selves together & at the first watch of the night "arm, and to your weapons: Follow me to a massacre, and not to a skirmish for if I do not deliver "them unto your hands fast asleep to be hewn in pieces like sheep and oxen, I resuse not to see the F " same end of mine estate at Ardea, that I have found already at Rome. There was not one there, how loever affected he was, friend or foe to Camillus, but was perswaded that the like warrior was not in those daies to befound again. The affembly being broken up, they refresh their bodies, ready to fight fo foon as ever the Signal should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the begin-ning and fift watch of the night, they were feady with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Cor ps de guard, neglected on every fide: and it with a mighty cry they affail. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fait affeep) were hacked and cut in pieces. Howbeit, some of those that were furthest off, being scared out of their couches, not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other-some stumbled at una-G wares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Ardea, were by the townsmen, who sallied out upon them as they were dispersed, environed and slain. The like flaughter to this there was of the Tuscans in the Country of Veii: who had so little pity and compassion, to see a City which well near for four hundred years space bordering upon them, was now furprised by a strange enemy not heard of afore, that even at that very timethey made rodes into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purposed to assail even Veii also and the garrison, being the only place and means of rescue, and the last hope of the Roman name.

The Fifth Book of T. Livius.

The Roman fouldiers that lay in garrison there had espied these Tuscans ranging about the coun-H try and gathered together in a body to drive booties afore them: and withall they described their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitted their own estate, but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tulcans also, from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themselves, should in their calamities thus scorn them and have them in derision: so as they could fearely temper themselves and forbear, but prefently set upon them. But being stated perforce by Captain (editim, a Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit untill night; Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camillus: else all the service was archieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy faccels. Over and befides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unilain I over night, they went forward as far as Saline, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a judden they made a greater havock and flaughter of them, and fo in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veis. At Rome in this mean time, the frege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whiles the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant yong Roman behaved himlelf fo, as his own countrimen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a let facrifice or solemnity to be celebrated by the house and lings of Fabii, in the Mount Quirinalis. For the accomplishment whereof, Caiss Fabi-sus. Dorsino in his holy robes, after the Gabins fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came downfrom the Capitol, passed through the midst of the enemies corps de K guard, and nothing moved what foever was done or faid to terrifie him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the fame way with like constant countenance and comly pace, hoping affiredly, that the gods would bemercifull and gracious unto him, whose worthip he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were aftonied at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devour. At Veii in the mean while, they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also; for that not only Romans this ther repaired ont of the country, such as either in discomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the Citynow taken, had been (cattered: but also our of Latium divers of their own accord L had flocked thinker, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was firong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the fouldiers were such as had archieved prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Cediring gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himfelf as mindfull of his own place, call for a General, So by general confent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sent for from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modest were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontus Comini- M #1.a valorous young man, promited his service. Who bearing himself upon a bark or corke under him, hulled along the Tyber down the water to the City; and fothenext way from the strand, over a fleep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he paffeth through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magistrates, declareth there his message from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Cmia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand: and that the souldiers might have for their Generall whom they defired: the messenger returned the sameway back again to Veit. And Embassadours were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veis, But I would rather be eeve that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senate, N And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unless he were named Dictators, have the conduct of the Army; there passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his absence. Whiles these things were a doing at Veis, the Cassle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing that way as the messenger went from Vail, or espied at the cliss of Carmentis, an easie place to climb up: in a clear night fent a man before unarmed to assay the peffage, & then gave him up his armour, and where it was fleep, one helped, lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such filence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them, but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at every notic in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not fo escape the geele, O which were confecrated unto Jano, and for all the fearcity of victuals, were spared and not killed up. And this it was that faved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M. Manline who three years before had been Conful, a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest with all to take arms. And whiles all elie made hast in a great fright, he stroke the Gaul who now stood upon the top, with the bofs and pike of his buckler, and turned himdown. The fall of whom overturned them that

A were next. Then flew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand and took hold of the stones whereto they clinged close. By which time, the rest being come together fome flinging darts, others catting down tiones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them loft their fure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeared the reft of the night (so far forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past disquieted them) they gave themselves to sleep. When day was come the souldiers by sound of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mif-doing: Manlius first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the souldiers. Upon whom, B they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home to his house (which stood upon the Castle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of : but in that scarcity this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, pluckt from himself and the necessations of his life, and conferred the fame to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were fummoned to appear the fentinels of that place where the enemy climed up undeferied. And when as P. Sulpring a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all the fouldiers cried our with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and io for fear of a mutiny he ipared all the rest: and with their generall consent and approbation, he caused that undoubted guitty perion to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumfpect c in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly noised that there passed meifengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries that follow war and siege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with petillence befides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hils; exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of imoak, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith stifled and choaked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them severally one by one they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and so burnt them and made that place famous and no D table by the name of Buffa Gallica.i.e. Gaulbury Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with Buffa Gallica. the Romans, and emparted together by fufferance of the Generals. In which parties, when as the Gauls very often alledged the famine, and upon that extremity periwaded them to yeeld: it is faid that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitol flung out loaves of bread into the very flations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be diffembled nor fustained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictator mustereth a power at Ardea by himself, he commandeth the Generall of horsemen, L. V. elerius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh to good preparation, and furnisheth himself to, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean feafon, the army of the Capitol wearied out with watching and warding having furmounted all humane miferies befides E hunger, which only of all others, nature would not fuffer to be overcome: looking day by day for succour from the Dictator now at last when not only their sood, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yield or to ransome themselves upon any condition, they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and faid, they might be entreated for a smal consideration to give over siege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commission to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpitius Tribune Military, and Brennus the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a * thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was f 26000 lib. Fa most odious and shameful thing, but there was adjoyned thereunto a foul indignity. For English. the Gauls brought forth falle weights and uneven ballances. And when the Tribune refused them, behold, the infolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sword weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Romans to hear) Woe worth men conquered, and down with them fill. But neither God norman would abide the Romans to live ransomed. For by good hap, before that shameful sum of money by composition was paid, before (I ray) that upon some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made refiltance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again replieth, and faith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after he was made G Distator, had been by an inferiour Magistrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant: and withall warneth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight : commanding his own souldiers to call all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harnels, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of steel, and not by weight of sword to redeem their Country, having in fight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the foil whereon the City stood (deformed now with miseries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground would give him leave being the plot only of a Ciry half ruinate and lying along, and with- H all of it ielf naturally uneven. Forecasting and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his souldiers turn, as far as martiall skill could possibly reach. The Gauls as frighted at this folirange an occurrent, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger rather than with any confiderate different on, they ran upon the Romans, Now had Fortune turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy affifted the Romans. Therefore at the first encountry ter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had atchieved the victory at Allia, Afterwards alio, in another more fet battell in the way of Gabes, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken, and not I fo much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returneth again with triumph into the City. And in all the fports and pleasant ditties which the souldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was stiled Romulus the lather of the Country, the second sounder of the City, which were no vain titles of

When he had saved his Country thus in war, he preserved it afterwards again undoubtedly in time of peace, namely in gainfaying their transmigration to Veii: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he refigned not up his Dicatorship; being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in so X doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and formost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he proposed those things which concerned the immortall gods: and causeth anact of the Senat to bemade. Imprimis, that all the Temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleaning them should be searched out of the books of Sybilla by the Duumvirs. Moreover that with the inhabitants of Care, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the facred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not foreset and discontinued, Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Capitolini, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had fill defended and preferved his own feat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome, in that fearful L time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also fome satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new Causey to Ains Locatius. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which our of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the chancel or chappel of fap ter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy and tacred to Jupiter; and order taken that it should be bestowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this. That when there was not gold M enough in the common cheft, to make up the full fum of the raniom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplified which appertained to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senate for todo: then and not afore, upon the ftirs that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their affemblies, folliciting them to leave the ruins of the City, and to remove with all they had to Veii, a town readily furnished to their hand: then (I say) and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the N people spake in this wife. So grievous to me, O Quirties, is all contention and variance with the "Tribunes of the Commons, that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and folace, in Gamillus to the . " that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from those "debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I affure you, but that you "called me back, both by act of Senat, and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind but your calamity and diffred estate, that hath forced me to return again "unto you. Forthis was the very point that you flood upon namely, that our country might con-"tinue fill and keep her ancient place: and not Iwis, that I should remain and dwell therein a-

A "Roman victors? And shad our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our "City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and di-"vine tolemn fervice, instituted even with the foundation of our City: & that we counted all va-"nities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power "of God hath affilted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect "the worship of God. For consider with me I pray you either the prosperity of the adversity of these years late past, one after another; ye shall find, that as long as we served God and followed "his will fo long we prospered & went sorward: and all the while that we despised the same, we "ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and formost the Veient war (recount I beseech B" you)how many years lasted it? how troublesome and painful was it? And ended it was not, be-"fore that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Albane " pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Began it (and say truth) before that voice which came from heaven was made fo light of, concerning the coming of the "Gauls?before the law of nations was by our Embassadours broken?and before that through the ' fame neglest of the gods that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have "been punished and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquished made captive, put to "our ransome, and suffered such condign punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we "are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our advertity and affliction put " us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol to the gods, even C" to the very feat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own privat effate went to havock, "the facred monuments yet and holy Images, some we hid in the earth some we conveyed away "into the neighbour Towns, and removed them out of our enemies fight. And albeit we were "forlorn and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor discontinued the fer-"vice of the gods. And therefore gave they us our country again, they gave us victory, and the "ancient honour of war which we had loft: and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with coseveronsness, lin the weighing of gold brake both covenant and sidelity, they have turned all sear-fulness, all slight & slaughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by these to great and apparent signs, " & testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to dishonor him, "perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge ourselvs into, being scarcely got forth "and escaped out of the shipwrack and perill of our former fin and calamity? A City we have "founded and built, by the will of God and due observation of Augury and Auspices, no corner "therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn facrifices, there are set daies "when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be perfor"med, And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all these gods both publike & privat? how for-" teth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the fiege, was feen with no less "admiration of our enemies, than our own selves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius? "when through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Cattle, and performed a folemin "duty of the house of Fabius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that "the facred ceremonies of privat families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted: E " and fuffer now the publike facrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and "the City abandoned? That our High Priests and Flamins should be less curious and precise in "the publike service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary seast of his family " and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Veni, or we will send "from thence our Priests hither for to execute that ministry. Neither of which can be done, sa-"ving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy: "daies, and of all the gods befides; In that one high feaft and folemn dinner of Jupiter, can a Pul-"vinar be celebrated, or a facred Table be spread and furnished in any place, but in the Capitol? "What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta? and of that Image, which as a pawn and secu-"rity of our imperial state, is kept within the safegard of that Temple? What should I speak of F" those your Ancilia and Scutcheons? O Mars Gradiuns, and thou father Quirinus: are ye well "contented that all these sestivall and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the Ci-"ty, yea, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, should be for fa-"ken in a profane place: But fee what ods there is between us and our anceftors? They left un-"to us certain folemn feafts and facrifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Lavini-"um. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion that some settival solemnities were brought "unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our e-"nemies City Veii, without a great and hainous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call "to mind I pray you, how often our feafts and facrifices have been renewed and reformed clean, "for that fome one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, hath G" been over-flipt and left out. And even of late, what was it elie that (after the strange miracle of "the Alban Pool) relieved our Common-weal to distressed with the Veient war, but the reforma-"tion of our divine service, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in "remembrance of antient religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome forrain gods; "and also have inflittited and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that (in regard of "the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons) upon which Queen Juno late tran-"flated from Veil, was dedicated in Aventine? And to Ains Locatius, for a voice from heaven

" heard in the new causey, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad-H "ded to other solemn featts, & thereto we have ordained and sounded a newguild or fraternity, " even by the advice of the Senat, And what need was there, that we should have done any of these "things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And if we were for lear of our enemies, held back from going elsewhither? Thus much of our feltival "daies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once " of it, what a infull deed you are about? As for the Vestall Votaries and Nuns, it is certain, this " is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City, "The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests I of Romans to be, ome Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, O Vesta, leave thee now? and so shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great im-" piety, both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great soce lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomery or compass of the "City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leet or affembly of the Curia for "matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Military Tri-"bunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Auspices) but in "the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Veii? or shall the people repair hitherfrom "thence with fo great trouble and inconvenience, to a defolate City, for faken of God and man, " when so ever they would hold those affemblies? Manlius, who had defended the Capitoll from the Gauls, whiles he dischargeth the debs of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned was convicted of aspiring to be King, and thrown down from the cliff Tarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that none of the house of Manlius should be surnamed Marcus. C. Licinius, and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, proposed a law, that Confuls also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And albeit the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five years pace the same Tribune continued the only Magistrates of the City, they went through with that law and got it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was of Commoners. A second Law there passed likewise, That no man might possess above five hundred acres of land.

him (as chief and principall) it fill bare and refled, and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Confular) in time of whose government the City was lost, they liked not that they k should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interreign. Now while the City was busie in continuall work and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius fo foon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commons arrested to make his answer at a day appointed. Who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought against the Gauls, unto whom he was fent in embassage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judicial triall, by his death: and died fo just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entred upon the Interreign : and after him M.Furius Camillus the second time, He created Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the fecond time, L. Virginius, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Emylius, and L. Posthumius, Thele men presently after the Interreign, were not so soon entred into office, but before all other things, they consulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conscience. And first of all they commanded, that all the inftruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws alio (& those were the twelve tables, & certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be fought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppressed: especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismal daies. And the fifteenth day before the * Calends of Angust, so notorious for a twofold loss and overthrow ; upon which day at Cremera the Fabii were all flain, and after at Allia an unfortunate M field was fought, even to the utter ruin and desolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Allienfis: and fet this unlucky mark upon it, That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any business as well publike as private. Some think, because upon the next day following the * Ides of July, Sulpitius the Tribune Military could not by facrifice find any tokens of happy speed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman hoft fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies : therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing facrifice: and thereupon likewise, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and dismall as the other.

Difmal daies. † 18 of July.

But long they might not quietly fit about the devising of means to reform the Common-weal, N and set it upright again after so grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one side, the Volscians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the finall destruction of the Roman name. On the other fide, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and consederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Voltumna, to make war upon them, Besides a fresh and new sear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyall league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every fide, that all the world might fee apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common wealth should now be maintained and defended, 0 by whose condust and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius H.la for Generall of the Horsemen. And having proclaimed a law-steed (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muster of all the younger fort and serviceable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of thrength fufficient for service. Unto whom he likewise ministred the military oath of Alleageance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster book. When he

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Herraria in the Country of Ven : another he commanded to lie encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Emplim for their Commander. A third part he himself led against the Volscians : and not far from Lanuvium (the place is called Ad-Metium)he began to affault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General, it stroke such a fear and terrour among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of n their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to let on fire that Barricado which flood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour likewile and imoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amated & associed the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and pallisado, into the Camp of the Volscians, than ingetting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies, and won withall the Camp in the same brunt, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the fouldiers: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their General his hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards. After this he followed them that fled, in chate, wasted and forraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventieth year of the war) he wholy subdued the Vosscians, and forced them to yield subjection. After this conquest, he departed from thence against the Æquians, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bola, and assailed not only their Camp but also forced the City and at the first assault won both.

But whiles fortune miled thus, what way foever Camillus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the sear of peril greatly encreased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Satrium, and belieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whole Embassadours came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distress, and had a decree gran-D ted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should rescue the Sutrines, But being so straightly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen, who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloudy fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrenderup the City to the enemies and being disarmed and sent away with a single sute of apparrel (after a piteous fort all a-row,) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But see, it fortuned that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whole feet the multitude all forrowful lay proftrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity fell to befeech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with woful tears and lamentations. But he willed the Sutrines to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: faying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caused he his souldiers to lay down their packs, and load, the Sutrines likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Surrium. Where; according to his expectation, he found the enemies all carelessand secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous success.) No warders, no corps de gua d quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquerours here and there sacking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houles, So was Surrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were Surrium in hewn in peeces on every fide, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves day, Fround nor gather together into one place, no, nor to take weapon in hand: whiles every man for life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they foundfalt shut, for so the Distator had given order afore-hand.

Hereupon some betook themselves to their weapons: others namely, such as hapned to be armed when this sudden turnult surprised them) fell to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been horly fought, had not the Criers and Trumpets which were fent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but those that were found in arms. Upon this, even they who in that extremity and despair were fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flung away their weapons: and thus difar-G med as they were (for as the cale flood, it was the fafer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were bestowed in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was delivered again unto the Sutrines, safe and sound without any hurr at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but furrendred upon composition. Camillus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three fundry wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he fold, in port-fale at the spear, and rused such a sum of mony, that when he had out of it repaid the dames [of Rome] to the worth of their gold, there were of the furplufage H thereof three bouls made of maffie gold: which with the title and infeription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be feen in the chappell of Jupiter fet up and bestowed at the feet of Juno. The fame year, there were enfranchifed and made Cirizens of Rome, fuch Veientians, Capenates and Falifcians, as in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans : and for these new Citizens were certain lands fet out. Those also, who for idleness loath to build at Rome, were gone to Veii, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence, And they at the first, grumbled & refused to obey-but after that a day was set them, & they threatned upon pain of death to return again to Rome; as flout as they were, and obfinate all of them 1 together now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increased in number of inhabitants, and became well peopled: so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices: whiles the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Ædiles by vertue of their office called hard upon them, haftning them forward as to a publike workiyea, and every man privately made all freed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and flood on soot again,

The Capitoll

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes military in Confuls authority. At the years end was the great Election field for 1.10 men mittary in Consus authority. Wherein were created T. Quintins Cincimatus, Q. Servilius Fideras the fifth time, Julius Tulius, L. Aguilius Covus, L. Lucreium Tricipiinus, Ser. Sulpitius Roffus. One army they let out and led againft the Equians, not to war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon k meerspight and deadly hatred, to waste all their bolders utterly, and to leave them no power and firength to enterprile any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinii, Where, two towns of the Tulcans, Cortuo a and Contenebra, were by affault won and raked. At Cortuo a was no refistance made. For the Romans surprised them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it . The town was sacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the alfault for some sew daies: but the continual labour, slacking neither day nor night overcharged them: wheras the Roman Army divided into fix parts, fought fix hours in their feveral turns, round one after the other. And the townsmen being but sew, and those overtoiled, were fain without any supply, still to maintain fresh skirmishes. Whereupon at last they retreated back & yielded .giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the L fpoil should be conficat and go to the common treasury; but the commandment and proclamation was more flackthan their purpose on that behalf. For whilest they lingred and protracted time, the fouldiers already had leifed in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and harred, the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built of squared ashler stone: A piece of work even in this fo glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent, And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whiles the City was busied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agraria (about the division of the lands) in all their built of fquare affemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to set forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomprine Territory, which then above all others, to prefently upon the jubduing and jubversion of the Volicians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull possession of the people of Rome Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, so long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inrodes thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entred and made havock in the possessions of the common lands: and unless (before they had let fure footing there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemble to blies, whiles they plied their building: and also for that money was away, and their purses so emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to flore N and flock they were not able. The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious upon their late calamity: Insomuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia or theso lemnity of prelages taken by bird-flight] for some errour supposed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after another M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, L. Valerius Potitus Valerius at length held the affembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Confuls authority and created L. Papirins, Cn. Sergius L. Emplius the second time, L. Licinius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interreign, began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T.Quintius, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties 0 Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoyned Stellatina, Pomatina Sabbatina, Arniensis and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes, And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons, Was in hand with the people in greater number affembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more enclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat house, to make war upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that mitter was not followed, but put off to a further time : by reason of preparation for a greater was

A Hetruria was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribun Military with Confuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyned unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the sixth time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned clean away from the careful regard they had of the Tuscan war, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine country, came all of a judden in great half to the City, and brought word, that the Antiates were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had fent their able youth to that war closely underhand, thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State and standing upon this point, that by the covenant there was no proviso, but that voluntary souldiers might lerve R in what wars foever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned, to fet light no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a privat person, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office confessed frankly that he was the only man to have the loveraign and absolute Regiment of all, in case there were any fearful and dangerous war toward : and were fully resolved, to yeeld up all their interest in government unto him, thinking it no disparagement at all unto them, nor any loss of their own honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the Tribuns, and Camillus was much abashed in his mind, howbeir he gave them hearty thanks, and ipske in this wife. "A weighty burthen (quoth he) I fee is imposed upon me by the people of

C. Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dickator now the fourth time; a greater of M. Forius "charge is enjoyned me by the Senat; the whole state and body of which order, hath delivered to camillus to his "fingular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heaviest load of all is laid upon me by the companions in " exceeding kindness and obsequious benignity of these my honourable brethren and collegues, government, "If any painful travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I wil earnestly en-"deavour, I wil strain and strive to answer thereunto: that the opinion which the City with so "great consent hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be " perpetual. As to that war of the Antiats, there are more brags and threats than any danger "and peril from thence. But as I would counfel and advise you to be afraid of no war, to I would "not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is beset on every side : partly "envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and D "envised, and party nated or ten instances to the Common-weal. I think it good therefore " (quoth he) O Valerius, that you affilt me in government and counsel, and have the leading toer gether with me of certain legions against the Antiat enemies. That you Q. Servilius, with an-" other army wel appointed, and in readiness, lye encamped hard by the City side, having an "eye and good regard, lest either Hetruria in the mean while, (as of late dayes) or the Latins and "Hernicks (who trouble us now afresh) break out and make some rising. Assured I am, that you " wil behave your felf, and quit you in this service to worthily, as may answer the samous me-" mory of such a father and grandsire as you have had, may beseem your own honourable per-"fon, and those six Tribunships which you have already performed. E "him leavy a third power of men, confifting of those that are by reason of sickness or otherwise "excused for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be in stead of a gari-"fon for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harness, weapons, corn, and "other necessaries for war, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, we your fel-"low Tribuns, ordain you President of this publick Councel, the Custos and keeper of Religion " and Church-matters, of general affemblies, of the Laws and all other civil affairs of policy what-" foever. Now when they had all made promite, and that most willingly to do their endeavour in performing their several charges, Valerius whom he had joyned with himself in commission, added moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, so would he be unto him again in stead of his Coronel of Horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Se-F nat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only Soveraign General, the same hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators hereat took great joy and contentment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding wel of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-weal (say they) everstand in need of Dictator, so long as such Magistrass be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeelding their proper praise to the honour of the Common-weal, than dilmembring and plucking from it to their private glory and re-

These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman fouldier, and made him to startle. Which when the Centurions' reported to Camillus, as he was Marshalling and setting his battels in array; and that in these terms; to wit, that the hearts of his souldiers were disquieted and dismayed, that they took themselves but slowly to their weapons, made staying and idling when they should come forth of their tents, yea, and that there were some of them overheard to say, that, They must fight one to an hundred, and that so great a multitude of their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountred much less, being so well armed H and appointed: he mounted prefently upon Horieback, and rode before the enigns, and then turning himself afront his army, travering between the ranks and arraies; "What heaviness is "this my fouldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? And ye again are "the men, who under my conduct (to fay nothing of the winning of Falerii and Veit, and of the flaughter of the Gauls Legions, put to the fword by us, even when our native City was by them " taken, and they masters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon "a triple victory, over the same Volscians, Equians and people of Hetruria. What, do ye not I " agnize and accept me for your General, because not as Dictator, but as Tribun, I gave you the "watchword, and put out the banner of battel? For mine own part, I stand not much upon ab-(folute and foveraign command over you: no more likewife should ye regard oughtelle in me, "but mine own self. For never yet did my Dictatorship make me hauty and set me up alost, no "more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me down. We are the same menstill all "of us: and fince we are come to this war, jurnished with the same means that we carried with 44 us unto the former, let us look for the same event of our service, and no worse. So soon as ye 66 shall encounter and joyn battel with them, perform each one that which he hath been raught and wonted to the journey furely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after « he had founded the battel, he alighteth from his Horse, and caught the ensign-bearer that stood K next him, with his hand, haled himforward against the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-enfign, and advance forward, fouldier. When they faw that Camillus in person, a man wellstept in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily strength, put himlelf forth against the enemy : all at once they pressed forward, set up an outcry and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for shame. Over and besides, fome fay that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an enlign flung into the very battel among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, hestirred themselves hustily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antiates first discomfitted, and the fear not only came upon them in the vanguard, but entred also and reached as far as the rereward, that stood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the fouldiers, provoked by the presence of their Captain, much trou- I bled the enemy: (o nothing more dounted the hearts of the Volicians, than the very fight of Camillur himself, when they chanced to c'pie him. So surely carried hethe victory with him, which way foever he went! And that appeared most evidently in this, That when he saw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took him elf in all haft to his Horse, rode thither with his light footmans buckler, and with his only prefence renewed the fight; shewing unto them how the rest of the battel had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worst, and the vistory enclined to a fide. But their multitude both hindred themselves in their flight: and also a long peece of work the wearied fouldiers of the Romans had to put fo great a number, all to the fword. But behold, there fell a great tempelt of rainall of a fudden, which powred down with so mighty winds and florms, that it rather put them by the execution of affured victory, than parted any M battel or stayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was founded: and the nightenfuing, whiles the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war, For the Latins and Hernicks for sook the Vollcians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volicians seeing themselves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and confidence they had rebelled quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Sairicum; whom Camillus at first began to besiege, casting a trench and rampier about them, raising bastillons and plat-forms against the Town. And seeing his munitions and sabricks by no sallying forth of the enemies impeached, he supposed there was no such courage in them, that he should need to stand fo long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themselves out in a tedious and toilful piece of service, as if they lay at the siege of Veil: assuring them that the N victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his souldiers, he set ladders upon every side, scaled the walls, and entred the Town. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yeelded themselves. But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Anti-um, being the feat Town of the Volstians, and from whence the beginning of the last war arole. Howbeit because to strong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordinance& engins of battery leaving his collegue behind him with the army, he went himself to Rome, to perswade with the Senat for to destroy and rase Antium utterly, And whiles he was emparling with them (fuch was the will of God I believe, that Antium should stand still & continue longer) there came Embashidors from Neper and Surrium, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it O was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Upon which occasion it sell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Artium. For feeing that those two Towns flood even against Hetruria, as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars; & the Romans alio held it a matter of great confequence, to refeue and defend those frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Anium, and to undertake the war with the Inicans. The City-legions under General Quintins, were appointed unto him.

A And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volk ians Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his aflociat fill, and joyned with him in commission. So Quintius and Horatius were sent to succeed Valerius in the Volician war, Furius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Sutrium, and found the one fide of the Town possessed already by the Tuicans. On the other side, the Townsmen, for that the enemy had stopped all passages between, hardly able to repel the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the name befides of Camillus, (to highly renowned as well amongst the enemies as Allies) both for the prefent gave them heart to abide the brunt, and (ti. k to it (till that

R were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and respit to come in with iresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his collegue, for to bring about his power; to that fide which the enemies held, and there to make an affault: not so much for any hope he had by scaling the walls to win the City; as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to ease the Townimen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with affaults) but also to get himself some opportunity and vantage, to enter the City without skirmith and refiftance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscanes beset with a two-fold sear round about, seeing the veied, walls assailed most fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: flung out at one gate (which as it hapned was not befet) and in great hast all together fought to elcape Caway. But as they fled, they were flain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Furius his fouldiers. Valerius his men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

When Sutrium was thus recovered and restored again to their allies they led forward the army to Nepet: which Town the Tulcans held wholly, as surrendred already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a buse peece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepesius, by treason had yeelded it up. Howbeit, they relolved to fend unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behalf trusty and faithful loyalty, D like as they had craved and belought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection, From whom they received this answer again, That it lay not now in them to do anything at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls, and warded the gates. Whereupon they first terrined and scared the Townsmen with foraging and spoiling their territory: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendred, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded; they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of brush wood, and such like trouss, and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, set ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that Nepet taken, all the Nepennes should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarra-E ed, should be spared. But the Tuscans, as well armed as unarmed, were put to the sword every one,

As for the chief authors that perswaded the Nepesines to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmless multitude had their goods restored, and so the Town was left with agarrison. Thus the two Tribuns (Consular) having regained out of the enemies hands two con-federat Cities, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained : and the cause demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had let forth no fouldiers to the Romans wars. Answer from both Nations in their folemn Councels was returned: "That neither the fault was general, The excele of or proceeding from counsel of the State, in case some of their youth served under the Volicians: the Latins and

F " and yet them elves had well payd already for their lewd and rash projects, in that not one of Hernicks. "them was come homealive. And as to the not fending forth of fouldiers, the cause was, for "that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volicians: which noisome plague (as it "were) flicking so closeunto their sides, unless they could be rid of, notwithstanding so many "wars one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought so well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quarrel and occasion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to tol-

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quintius, both Capitolini, and L. Papirius Curfor the second time, were Tribuns Consular, there arose a grievous war G abroad, and a more dangerous sedition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volscians, banded with the Latins and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The fedition (where it was least feared) from a personage of noble linage descended, of great name and reputation, M. Manins Capitalinus. Who being a man of too lofty and hauty a minde, despited all other of the Nobility, and envied one above the rest, M. Furius, so singular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his worthy parts and commendable vertues. He could not brook and M. Maning. endure, that he only should ever be Lord General in the field: who now was exalted so high intending is above others, that even those who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as dition.

his peers and fellows, but employed as his Ministers and Servicors. "Whereas (quoth he) if "men would weigh aright, and duly confider every thing, M, Furius could never have delivered is his Country from the frege of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Castle cliff been saved by "me alcre, (amilius iet upon the Gauls, when they were amuled in receiving their gold, when "they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and fecure: whereas my felf chafed them "away whiles they were in arms, and at the point to win the Castle Hill. In that exploit of Ca-" millur the fouldiers, had each one his thare proportionably of the glory, who together with "him did their parts; but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and " partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud spirit, being withal by corrupt diposition of nature, hot and hasty, arrogant and insolent. Discontented I befides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not effeemed of that worth, as in his own judgement they deferved: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, and impart his deligns unto the Magistrats of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: (olliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast aliking and favour toward himielf: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by tage countel and diferetion: and in one word , chusing rather to be of great name , than of good and honest report. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agraria, about the division of Lands, which had alwayes minittred to the Tribuns of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and feditions; he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goads, and prick shrewdly: threatning K not only poverty and fhame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonment, little ease, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtful to mens state) even of the richer fort, by reason of their great expenses defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volicians, which was it fell of great importance, but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in shew precended, as a cause to feek for to have a more foveraign and absolute power to govern the State : but in truth, these new defignments and plots of Manlins, rather than the war, forced the Senat to creat a Dictator. And A. Cornelius Coffus being created, nominated for his General of Horle, T. Quintins Capirolinus. The Dictator, albeit he law a greater comention toward, at home than abroad, yet (were it that the warrequired some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he I thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took musters, and set forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclaimed their forces, to repair.

Idoubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars sought with the Volscians, besides their redious satiety of reading, will muse also at this (which to my self was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived neer about the times of these acts) how these Volicians and Æquians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supply of fouldiers to maintain their wars. But feeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpassed with filence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himlelf? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now M we see in the Roman musters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger fort, to the maintenance and renuing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not alwayes levied out of the same States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the felf-same nation; or that those countries yeelded in those dayes an infinit number of freemen, which now are well near wast and defart, but for some Roman slaves, which keep those parts yet from being void and dispeopled, as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiers.

Certainly, the Volicians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were fore weakned, and their strength much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circeians, and other Coloners from Vdire. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and N the next morrow come abroad with happy tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also flain a factifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner thewed himself unto his souldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the found of Trumpet for battel. The day is ours of A. comiliation (quoth he) my valorous fouldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretel future events. "Therefore as resolut men of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our "felves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our fwords only. Neither would I tor to his foul-"have you to run out of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to 6: fland fledfaft, and abide the first shock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of " (hot invain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, () "and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Ro-"mans. The Gods I say, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have Gent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quiminus, keep your Horsemen close to-"gether, marking advifedly the first beginning of the skirmish; and when you feethe battels 6 buckletogether pell-mell, and come to hand-firokes, whiles they are busied and occupied one way. fright them another way with your Horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arraies. Thus fought both Horse and Foot according to his direction. And

A as the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more missed the Captain of happy speed. The multitude of the enemies trufting upon nothing but their own number, which they measured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rashly gave battel, and as rashly gave over again. In shout only and shot shewing themselves hot and eager at the first encounter: but were not able to abide the sword-fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the firy countenance of their enemies, which for the very heat of their courage, shined and gliftered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put back, a fear came upon them likewife, that flood behind for supply, and withal, the Horsemen for their parts set to and sought most terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in fundry places were broken and all set out of

B order, so as their battailons seemed to flore and wave up and down to and ito, in supence whether to fight or flye. Afterwards, when they faw the formoil fmitten down and flain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward ftill and chased them. And so long as they went their way armed and thick hudled together, it was the footmens work to purfue them: but when it was perceived once, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled dispersed all abroad in the fields: then were the troups of Horièmen fet out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and so to give the main multitude of them in the mean while sufficient respit to escape: but that they should content themselves, only to let flye some shot amongst them, and by scaring them to hinder their running; and when

o they were ridden beyond, to crois upon them and thay them, until the footmen might overtake them flay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chateuntil night. The very same day was the Volicians camp taken and ransacked, and the whole piliage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the fouldiers. The greatest part defeated, of the prisoners were Hernicks and Latins: and those not of the common fort, and such as might be thought to have served for pay : but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volician enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known also to be among them some of the Circeians; yea, and certain of the Veliterne colony likewise. All of them were sent to Rome. Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confessed every one in plain terms, the re-D volting of their own Nation, like as they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator fill kept his forces together within the standing camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and

Senators of Rome would determine to war upon those countries.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which arose at home, caused him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by region of the Anthor thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any usually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Manius not by speeches, only, but by plain deeds also, (which in outward shew seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what troublesome and tumultuous spirit all proceeded. For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prison: E he in the mids of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out some words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the usurers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present distress of the party; Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpole, in faving the Capitol and the Callle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to see my fellow souldier (as if he were taken prisoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up fast in gyves and fetters. And therewith openly in fight of all the people paid the whole debt downright on the nail, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemn ceremony by a brasen peece of coin and the ballance, he fet him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large; "Who prayed hear- The mutinous F "tily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Manlius his only deliverer, and the very speeches of a "patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unruly Centurion. and fedicious throng, he prefently himself fet all a madding, shewing the lears of his wounds "received in the Veientians and Gauls wars, and in other services one after another: saying, "That whiles he thusfollowed fouldiery, and rebuilded his house that was destroyed, he became " indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest alwayes overgrew the principal, which "he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the ulurers book, " but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only good-"nesse of M. Marlius, Thave the liberty again to see the light of the Sun, to behold the Com-"monplace, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge " to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me : unto him I vow what-" soever in me is lest, and in his quarrel to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my whody: and in one word look what priviledge I may injoy in right of my country, and in the communicate with that communicate with that "one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted tinto one person; and who but Manlius now in every mans mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to fet every thing our of order. His Land in the territory of Veii , which was the chief and capital Manor Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he fecupon sale, causing it openly H to be cryed; and faid withal, I will not O Quiries, fo long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing elie left, see one of you condemned and upon execution carryed to prison. This set them so a flote, that they were ready, as it is eemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Befides, at home in his own houle, he foared not to cast out flandrous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Crois, making Orations. Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall these words, "That the Senators kept in serret certain hid-"den treasures of the Gaulsgold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the com-"mon grounds, but they would also embezle the treasure publick, which if it came abroad, the I "Commons might foon be acquit and discharged of their debts, This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be fire) an unworthy indignisy, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it then should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the fame gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a masse of mony and stoln good was hidden. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else, So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he resported a truth, not incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale, Things hanging thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he affembled the Senat: and after he had throughly founded and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commanded the Senators not to depart from and left the minds of them, that were interesting, necommanded the Senators note departition him: and affilted as he was with that companying caused the Ivory chair of estate to be feet in the Comitium or common Hall, and lent a serjeant for M. Manilus. Who being this peremptorily formomed by the Dichators express commandment, gave withing by a token to his complices and favourits, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinute of his followers, he preferred himself before the Tribunal. On the one fide, shoot the Senators, on the other the Commons, eight pure behalding their Caprain, as it were in a mich field ready in this hattel Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joyn battel,

And therefore am not "Ito be forced to reveal and shew where your stoln goods are: but you would be made, if you " were well ferved, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At these words, the Di-Autor commanded him to leave off thele foolish vapourings and trifling shifts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not justify it, to confels that he had falfely flandred and wrongfully charged the Senat, and fought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men, for a vain furmite and inspition of Theevery. But as he stoutly inferred and replied again, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any such service: he commanded him to be had away to prison and kept in bonds. And as he was B apprehended by the Officer, "O Japiter (quoth he) Optimus Maximus, O Iuno Queen of heaven, M. "And shall this right hand wherewith I deleated the Gauls, and drave them from your Chap-" pels and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that saw and heard him, who could indure this indignity. But this City, as most patient of all other Cities to abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self and was content in some cases to be overruled : so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durit either cast up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manlins was committed, it was for certain known, that a great fort of the Commoners, changed their weed and put on their world apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them with fad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goal-

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volicians, his triumph bred him more hatred and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not

abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy : and this only wanted, (fay they) to make up his pride to the full, that Manlius was not led before his chariot, Whereupon there was like to grow much scandal and very sedition. For the appearing and mitigation whereof, the Senat upon a fudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful, and affigued 2000. citizens of Rome to be fent to Satricum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was fee out Satricum made two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commoners construed to be a matter of no- a Colony, and thing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying Manling. So peopled with that this proved a mischief for a remedy: and by this salve, the sore rather sestered and rancied, Romans than healed up, and the fedition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of Manlins his followers made shew of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and sad countenance, after the guile of persons accused during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terrour was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph refigned up his authority, then folks hearts were fet at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, "That it was their fa-E" shions alwayes to lift up and advance their Protectors and Defenders into high places, and Theseditions "afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfal, to forfake and leave them defti"title. Thus cealed not the multitude to exclaim and make tol. their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatned to break the prison by force; until such time as they got that remitted, which otherwise they would have wrefted, and Manlins by an ast of the Senat was released out of prison and enlarged.

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circeia, and H they of Velitre, who came to excule themselves for the Volician war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entred into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more savourably with the rest that were their Allies) were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City, from the fight and presence of the people of Rome; for sear left the priviledge of Embassage, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should I not ferve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was fet oppoor agains/omewhat before the end of the year, the great affembly was holden for the Election of Magiltrats: wherein there were created Tribuns in Confuls authority Serg. Cornelius Malaginensis the second time, P. Valerius Potitus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulptim Ruffus the fecond time, C. Papirius Craffus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators cal-

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrain nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com, in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once any monters, they may the Senators again; because their minds being not distracted by any sear K from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp iet, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manling calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of flomack, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforetime. Netled he was, the rather by his late digrace and shame, who never before had been touched incredit, nor tafted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict, durft not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extended upon Sp. Melins: and it feemed unto him, that not only the Dist fought to wind himself out, and in refigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very L Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being pussed up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I prayyou, will ye be ignorant, and not know what Oration of 'ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it felf would not have so much as Oration of the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your the Commons & felves, and how few adverfaries ye have againft you. That mind they must give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both "in mine armour to fave you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from "proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mighty a people otherwise) as to think "it fufficient, and to fland contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help "against your enemies; and to know no other stuffing with your adversaries (the Senators) but "wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you 6 by kind. By the and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. "I profess my lelf a Patron of the Commons, which name my care over you, my faithfulness to wou, bath indued me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious * stile of honour and Majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that * i. of King. which you long for and defire. And so from that time forward, began some practile to set up the M. Mailures. B Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms thefe gireth to a plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other fide, the Senators fat in Coun- Kingdom, cel, and debated about the Secession and secret meeting of the Commons in the privat house of Manlim, and that house, which flood (as it fell out) upon the Castle Hill: likewise of that imminent engine and fabrick, devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilus Hala, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off, might end this intestine and civil war. But they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effect all one, That the Magistrates should have a careful eye, that by these mischievous plots and practises of A form of C M. Manlius, the Comman-west incurred no dammage and hurr. Then the Tribuns in Confuls au- commission thority, and the other Tribuns of the Commons (for even they also seeing, that in the losse of the granted in thority, and use user 1 ripuus or the Collinois (for even they and feeings that in the folic of the great dangers publick liberty of all, their power likewife should come to on end, had yeelded to be adviced and great dangers and confident when course in the liberty of the State. ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and consulted what course was best to be taken. When as no man could bethink of any way, but plain violence and bloudshed (a peece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menanius, and Q. Publius, two Tribuns of the Commons stepped forth and said. " What mean we to make that, a quarrel be- On overture "tween the Senators and Commons, which the wholebody united of the City, indeed thould un- to the over-"dertake against so dangerous and pestilent a member? Why trouble we our selves to set upon throw of Man-"him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themselves, it were " the fafer course, and lesse offensive to assail? that being surcharged and overweighed with his "own power whereupon he presumeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are "fully minded to arrest him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is « leffe popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The "multitude (hall not fo foon see and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they "Thall become his comperent Judges, and pass upon him, who now are his Advocats: also, that 6. his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at " the bar, and the inditement framed, upon the crime of usurping the Kingdom: but (be ye sure "of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and person of no man, before the cause of their " own free estate. When all the honse liked well, and allowed of this advise and overture, they E made no more ado, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soon done, but the Commons at the very first, began to storm and be enraged, especially when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so rufully arraied, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinity, no, nor his very brethren Au. and T. Manlins. A thing before that day never feet nor known, but that in fo great a danger as this was, the neerest kinsfolk in blond, didchange their weed. For even when Ap. Claudius his adverfary, yea, and the whole linage and name of the Claudii, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparelled. Now jurely (fay they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, so gracious and welbeloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons, When the day was come of his arraignment, F I can find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of afpiring to a Kingdom, but only the conventicles of the multitude, certain feditious words, his overmuch largels, and his forged furmife and falle information of the gold. I doubt not but there was marter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his caute, but occasioned by the place only. This one thing feemeth worthy to be noted, and for all mens learning, that how notable and how great foever his honor; worthip, and commendable parts were; the foul M. Maulius and and curied defire of tyrannical rule, made not only umpleasant and without grace, but also odious raigned, and and detectable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, welneer four hunhimself. dred men, whom he had laid out mony for grans, and without any interest or consideration: those whose goods he saved from port-sale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and besides, he not only reckoned up, but shewed alo in open fight, the honorable reflimonies of his fervice in the wars: as the ipoils of his enemies by him flain and difarmed, to the number of 30, gifts beltowed upon him by Generals in way of reward friends in the form of the 40. amongs which were two goodly * mural garlands for scaling and entring upon the walls form of the first: eight * civick coronets for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he presented there in place the citizens in the citi

there in place, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands: "Made of the and amongst them he nominated C. Servilius at that instant General of the Horsemen, and now branches, ablent. And when he had rehearled his noble feats of arms, and amplified them according to the H height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oration , as one whose words were sutable and answerable to his deeds: at the last he stript his breast bare, and shewed the scars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and petil of his flate: and prayed that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol cliff, and even to the lafegard of the people of Rome; they would vouchfafe the same people, in this difirefs of his woful calamity: befeeching them both all and fome, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themselves toward the Gods there, and so to proceed to judgement of him, All the whiles the people were cired and called by their Centuries, and the prifoner firetched forth [his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods; the Tribuns evidently law that unlefs they freed the eyes of the people from beholding the memorial of fo great a defert, it would never be that fo long as their minds were thus forestalled and possessed with that benefit of his they would find the enditement, were it never fo true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were lummoned to affemble in the grove Petelinus, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a fight of the Capitol. There the acculation prevailed more than compaffion, and the matter went against him: and so with hard and obdurat hearts, they pronounced a heavy and dolorous sentence, and which the very judges themselves had in horror. Some there be that fay there were Duumvirs ordained for the purpole, to make inquisition and sit upon this treason against the State, Thus being condemned the Tribuns caused K him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the felf fame that yeelded to that one man a monument and memorial both of fingular glory, and also of extreme punishment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of shame: the one publick, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was structe, where now the chappel and work-house, or mint-house of Moneta standeth, an Act was proposed unto the people, That none of the Senators linage should dwell on the cliffor Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his own line and kinred: For that by a general decree of the house of Mardii it was provided, That none of that family and race should ever after bear the name of M. Manlins. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man. But the people being now past all danger from him , calling to mind and considering without all affection, his vertues as they were found a misse of him shortly after. Yea, and for the petilence also which enfued soon upon, for that there could be no causes known of so great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlin: arguing thus, That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whose means their Temples had been delivered our of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and fearcity of corn withal, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there ensued the year following many wars, when as L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Manlim the third time, Ser. Sulpirine the third time, L. Lucretine , L. Emyline the third time, and M. N Trebonius were Tribuns Military in Confuls authority. For besides the Volicians, who by destine were appointed for ever in a manner to bufy and keep occupied the Roman fouldiers; besides the Colonies Circeia and Velitre, which a long time were about to rebel | befides Latium, that flood in doubtful terms and was suspected, the Lanuvines also, who had been a most fast and loyal City, all of a sudden rose and became new enemies. The LL, of the Senat supposing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revolting of the Veliterns, who were their natural citizens, had fo long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war against them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this Military service, they created certain Quinqueviri for the division of the Pomptine Lands: and Triumviris for the planting of a colony at Neper. Then they propounded unto the people, that N they would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And not with flanding the Tribuns of the Com. laboured earnestly, but all in vain, to dissiwade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyces for war. All that year passed in preparations only, but no army tet forth by reason of the plague : which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies respit to fue unto the Senat for peace, Many of them were inclined and flood thus affected, to fend a folemnembaffige with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publick peril was entangled and interested with the jeopardy of some private perions : and the authors of the backfliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing left they alone should bear all the blame and be delivered up as a facrifice to fatisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and alienated the Colonies from all confukation of feeking for peace. And not 0 only in their Councel-House was this Embassage then crossed , but many of the Commons also they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make fooil. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the first rumour raised concerning the Rebellion also of the Prenettines. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, and Lancones, into whole marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter against them they received at their hands so calm and cold an answer, that it seemed they gavelescredit to their complaints, because these were not willing they should prove true,

The year following, Sp. and L. Papixins, new Tribuns Military with Confuls authority, led the legions to Velure, whole four Collegues, Ser, Cornelius Maluginenfis the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpitius, L. Amylius the fourth time, were left Tribuns behind for defence of the City; and for fear lest they should hear some intelligence of new and fresh stirs out of Hetruria, where they suspected all would be naught. At Velitre they had the better hand of their enemies: there they found more Preneftins well neer; that came to fuccour; than the very Coloners themelves. For the City was so neer at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to five the sooner and yeelded them the only place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbare to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they n thought it not good to hold fight to the utter destruction of that Colony. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more tharp informations against the Prenestins than the Veliterns. So by an ASt of the Senat and affent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Prenestins: who in the year following joyned with the Volscians, and by force wan Satricum a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townimen even to the last; where most beaitly and cruelly they exercised their vi. The cruelty of Cory upon those that they took prisoners, and put them to the sword. The Romans took this flint. in a very ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribun Military the seventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Posthumius Regillensis, L. Furius and L. Lucretius, and

M. Fabius Ambustus.

The Volician war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to affift him therein, it fell to L. Farius his lot, one of the State-Tribuns, not fo much for the good of the Common-weal, as to minister unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown: as well in publick, (for that he fee all upright again, which by the rashness of Lucius was faln down) as also in private, for that out of his errour and mildoing Marcus Furius, rather fought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and stept in years and very aged, and when in the affembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse his seeble and crasy body, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he caried a lively spirit and lusty courage with him still: his senses were all fresh and found : and the late civil affairs had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no D great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions, confifting of 4000, apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Esquilina, and then he put himself in his journy to Satricum. The enemy who had won the Colony, nothing dismaid therat, and trusting in the number of his souldiers, wherein he had the better by ods, expected and stayd his coming there. And so soon as seunderstood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out : prefuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never fo ingular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or naught avail, in regard they were so few in namber. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a battel, but for the policy and rule E of one man; who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, fought so to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharp set: so as now he not only ranged his men before his own camp in battel array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with enfigns displayed, neer unto the trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and shew of his strength, wereupon he bare himfelf lo confidently. This could the Roman fouldiers hardly endure : and L. Furius one of the Tribuns Military, had more ado by far to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturous Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also puffed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and prelumeth upon smalleft grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiers being of themselves al-Fready hot enough, he inflamed and fet them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge: giving out ever and anon, "That wars were for young men, that mens hearts flourished and saded as their L. Farius to his "bodies did; which was seen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was souldiers."

"now become a draw-back and a temporifer, and one that would take his leifure: and he that et was wont, to foon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns, " now within his mures and rampier fat ftill and trifled out the time. And what hopes had he? 6 Dreamerh he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambush laidhe for? 4. Tufh, these policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull, God wot. In faith, "Camillus as he hath lived long enough, so hath he gained gloty enough. To what putpose then "(quorh he) should we suffer the whole puissance of a City, which ought indeed to be immor-"tal, for to age and wax old with the body of one man, whom all men fee to be but mortal. With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof, they called hard, and cryed for battel; "We are not able (quoth he) M. Furini, to L. Finin to keep in and repress any longer the violence of our souldiers; and as for the pride of the enemy, M. Faring. "whose courage by our delayes we have encreased and who insultesth over us, it is intolerable." "Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us all. Suffer your self to be over-

Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may "not be set in the forestront : but for other labours ; look what an old man may or ought to do I "in war, therein furely I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im-" mortal Gods, that some notable mishap befal not to make my former counsel good and praise-"worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advise so profitable and wholesome, nor the Gods vouchfafe to hear his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius, the author and principal periwader of battel, fetteth the vangard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and Squadrons for supply in the rereward but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp, Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their armour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave sooting and lost ground. Now, there was behind them on their back a prety rifing of an Hill, between their camp and the battet H and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain ftrong companies armed and well appointed: with this inftruction that whiles both armes were hard in fight, and when their enemies should come neer their trench and rampier, they might fally out on a ludden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they retreated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity unto the enemy to iffue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the improted victors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and deleten of the Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from out of the camp, and were fresh and lufty, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans fouldiers forgetting now both their late lufting nels, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and foftly in good order, but plain turned their backs on all fides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillu being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courser, and with all the speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rereward against the enemy: "Is this (quoth he) the fight, you fouldiers, that ye fo called for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight fouldiers, fly-"on now? It was your rafiness and fool hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardie "now, and nothing elfe, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General, "Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been alwayes wont by my leading, once more "win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is no coming thither, there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the fift they were ashamed, and M flayd themselves from farther flight; but after that they saw once the ensigns wheel about, and the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General himfelf, a man renowned for formany triumphs, and befides, for his venerable age fo revered, even amongst the formost eneggs, amid the greatest perils, and most distresses, advanced forth in perfon. Hereupon every one for his part, fet the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and encouraged one another, fo as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Netther was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Collegue unto the Horsemen (whiles he in the mean time marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of chiding (for what might he avail thereby, To long as he was himself in fault as well as the reft?) but laying afide all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and befought them both all and N fome to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky days L. Furing to his work, "Indeed (quoth he) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly "forbad, yet I choie rather to be partaker of the folly and railnes of all, than the wildome and "fage advite of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the "glory will be his: but I, unless the battel be revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most mi-

"ferable and pitious case) but the shame will redound and light upon my head and none ele. Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to bestow them among the waving and difordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go both together, as bravely minded with relolution, as they were richly and gorgeonly armed, And in what part foever they faw the footmen most distressed, there wanted neither in the Generals o nor in the fouldiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seen by the happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that crewhile they made femblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear, now fled in good fadnes The V-Vicinis as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were flain. As for the refl that remained in the camp, which prefently at one brunt was won, more of them were taken prisoners than killed. In the view & account taken of the captives, there were some of them known to be Tusculans, who were severed apart from the reft, and brought before the

A State-Tribuns. And upon examination, confessed statly, that they served by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith disquieted, for sear of war from so neer neighbors, said he would forthwith have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senat might not be ignorant how the Tusculans were revolted from their society. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the leaguer and the host. That days work had taught him now, not to prefer his own ways before the better counsel of another. And yet neither he himselfe, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digest this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon fo dangerous a point of downfal, And as wel in the holt, as allo at Rome, it was rife and current in every mans mouth: B that whereas the fight with the Volk ians was variable, and the service doubtful : for the ill speed. the discomfiture, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good succeis, Camillus only had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Councel House, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined war against the Tusculans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camilhus he requested to have an assistant joined with him in Commission: and being left to his own choice to take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation, he chole L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himfelt, he both delayed the infamy of his Collegue, and wan himself great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tusculans. For they by their constant observation The prudent of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able. diffin When the Romans entred and invaded their territory, they went not fo much as out of those of the Tuses places that lay neer the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forlet not the tilling of their lans: grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth folemnly in their long gowns to meet with the LL. Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the army, as well out of the City as Country. Camillas having pitched down his tents before the gates, and defirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the wals, as bare shew abroad in the Country, entred the City: and feeing the doors standing open, the shop-windows up, all kind of wares fet out to fale upon the bulks: the Craftf-men and Artifans bufily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar schools ringing again with a chirm of scholars, learning and D faying their leffons; the fireers full of women and children amongst the other common people going to and fro about their bufiness: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a refemblance of fearful men, no, nor so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus cast he his eyes into every corner, seeking where this war should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seen, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this present occasion; but all in so settled quietness and peace, as if they had scarcely heard any inkling or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this parience and sufferance of the enemies, he caused their Senat to affemble, unto whom he spake in this wife: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tufculans, have found the only armor of camillus to the "proof, and the forcible fense indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire. Senat of Tuje E "Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there. The Lords of the Councel wilweigh and confider, culum "whether ye deserved more punishment before, then pardon now. I wil not forestal and pick my of felf a private thank for a publick benefit. At my hands ye shal have this favour and liberty, to " fpeak for your felves and plead your own cause: as the Senat shal think good, so shal you speed "of your fuit. After that the Tusculans were come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while afore had been faithful Allies and kept their allegeance) feen to stand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Councel Chamber: the Lords of the Roman Senat, were presently moved thereat, and caused them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hospitality, more like then hostility. Then the Dictator of Tusculum made this speech and said: "Right honorable Senators, we against whom ye have proclamed and made war, The Dictator F " came forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed as ye fee us at this of Tufculumto "present standing in the porch of your Councel House. This was our array, this was the habit of the Senat of "our Commons, and always that be, unless at any time we shall put on arms for you and in your Rome. "quarrel, Thanks we yeeld to your Captains and to your Armies, that they have believed rather "their eyes than their ears: and where they faw no hostility at all, there they offered none them-"felves. That peace which we have shewed and observed, the same crave we humbly still at the "hands of your clemency. Turn we befeech you from us your forces thither, where war is to be "found. And if we must needs make trial (by suffering ought betyour pussiance and power bent a-gainst us, we will trust surely without armor. This is our full resolution, God grant it prove se as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a fingle heart. As for the trespasses, where-G "upon ye were moved to denounce war against us: although it be bootless and to no purpose to "disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely, were they never so true,

" we think verily, that without prejudice to our felves, we may fafely confess the same, since that "we have so evidently repented thereof. And for you, so long as you be worthy to have so full

" fatisfaction made, it skilleth not, what default or transgression be committed against you. Thus much in effect spake the Tusculans. At the very instant they obtained peace: and not long after, the right of free burgeofie, to be made Citizens of Rome. So the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tusculum. Thus Camillus having wongreat honor by his policy and valour both, in the Volscian war: by his happy success in the journey of Tusculum: by his singular patience and carriage of himfelf, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went our of his Magistracy: there being created Tribuns Military for the next year, L. Valerius the fifth time. and Pub. Valerius the third time, C. Servilius the third time, Licinius Menenius the tecond time,

P. P. pirius, Serg. Cornel us Maluginensis.

There was this year need of Cenfors also, by reason especially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts: whiles of the one fide the Tribuns of the Commons did aggravate the greatness thereof, and made it feem an odious matter: and they again of the other fide, did elevate and made litle of the same for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent mony should be thought abroad, in danger of being loft: for that (fay they) the debtors cautelously rather would not, than I for ability could not, keep their credit and make paiment. So there were created Cenfors C. Sulpitius Camerinus, Sp. Posthumius Regillensis. And this matter now already commenced, was broken off by the death of Posthumius, because it would have bred a scruple to chuse another Censor in the room of him deceased. When Sulpitius therefore had refigned up his place, it sell out so that other new Censors upon some error committed in their creation; exercised not their office: and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so tender conscienced were they, as if the gods were not well pleased with that office for that year. But the Tribuns would not endure this deluding of The Tribumof the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intollerable: faying, "That the Senat fought to avoid

"the exhibiting of publick records and books, which gave testimony of the valuation of every "mans substance to the worth: because they would not have the sums of debts to be seen and K " known: which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the City was even eaten up and "devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons so deeply engaged, were pack-"ed away, and sent forth against these enemies and those : and now without all regard and dis-"cretion, they fought occasions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antium to Satri-" cum, from Sairicum to Velitre, from thence to Tusculum have your Legions been posted. And "now, forfooth, there is war intended against the Latins, Hernicks and Prenestins: for hatred rather of the Citizenshere at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the "Commons with continual wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the City: that "in time of rest, they might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in com-"mon affembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribuns voice pleading for the ease. I ment of usury, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and "carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their ancestors liberty, they would suf-"fer neither any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debt, nor any musters for to be taken, until a view were made and just accompt had, of every man his debts, and some course ta-"ken for abating the same: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what " remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in cold iron and baleful prison. This hire and salary of sedition, this reward once propounded aforehand, stirred up (you may be sure) a mutiny soon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed, for the bruit and rumor that went of the Prenestin wars: both matters began to be hindred for M taking any effect, as well by the Tribuns help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribuns suffer those that were condemned to be led to prison: nor yet the younger fort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muster-master his book. And the Senators for the present, less minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behoof, then the mustering. For why? News came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Preneste, and were encamped in the Sabins country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickned and provoked the Tribuns of the Commons to the broil that was begun, than frighted them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the City, until the war was come in manner to the very walls. For the Preneftins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons N at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains hereupon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, spoiled and wasted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners displayed before the gate Cullina. Great fear was in the City, every min cried Alarm, run up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they lest their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator, He appointed for his General of horsemen, A. Sempronius Atronius. This was not fo soon voiced abroad, (so great a terror went always with that magistrate) but the enemies withal dislodged and departed from the walls: and the younger fort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus arifing at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Allia: and as they forraged the 0 Country all about, they bragged and vaunted among themselves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the Ciry of Rome, "Here wil be(fay they)the " like fight, from hence wil they fly; no doubt, as some imes they did before in the Gauls war. For "if the Romans feared that difmal and unlucky day, noted wit: the infamous name of this place; "how much more wil they dread the river Allia it felf, in memorial of their fo great overthrow, cr than the only bare day Allientis? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they fee "again the grim looks and hear the hideous voices of those savage Gauls. Thus rolling & tosing

A with themselves these toyish conceits, rising of as vain and soolish presumptions, they reflect wholly and reposed their full hope in the lucky perswation only of the place. The Romans contrariwife knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (wherefoever they were) the very fame men fill, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred years they held peaceably and quietly as their devoted vaffals in jubjection. And as for the place noted indeed, for the memorial of that late defeat and lois sultained, it might rather thir them up and let an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that shameful disgrace, then put them in fear, that any ground should be so unfortunat, as to be a bar unto their victory. Nay, if the very Gaulsthemfelves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they B did at Rome, in the recovery of their country; as they did the morrow after at Gabii: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entred within the walls of Rome, went ever home again to tell news how they sped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being resolute, and couragiously bent, they met at Alia. The Roman Dictator discovering the enemies arranged inbattel array, within light. "See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have flayed at Allia, of prefirming upon the luckiness of the place; No furer confidence no greater help may they have, 66 I pray God, But you, with truity armor, keen weapons, and doughty courage let spurs to horse, a gallop amongst the thikest of their main battel with your horsemen. I, with the legions on foot will advance mine Enfigns, and dilplay them, in their faces, and charge them hotly when they "are difbanded once, and put intear, Affift us now, and aid us, O ye gods (the witnesses of our C " league) and punish them duly for their deferts, both in dishonouring your divir e Majesty, and deceiving us in your name, whom they called folemnly to witness. Neither horsemen nor foormen. could the Preneftins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken. And feeing their Battailions in no place whole and kept together, they fled and amazed as they were in that confused fear, and carryed away beyond their own camp, they stayed not running for lite until by good footmanship they were come within the fight of Pren fee. There, all fach as had been scattered in the flight, mer together, and choic a plot of ground, to fortifie in that haste as well as they could: left peradventure, if they had put themselves within the town, forthwith their villages should have been fired, and after all consumed and spoiled, the town also might fortune to be befieged. But when the Roman Conqueror after the rifling of their camp at Allia was D once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort also, and gat within the town Prenefte, thinking themselves scarce safe enough within the walls thereof, Eight towns besides there were under the feignory of the Preneftins, against which the Distator warred round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his army against Velitre, and got that town also by assault. Then came he to the principal head and very seat town of the war, Pren fte, which was not by force won, but by furrender yeelded up into his hands. And T. Quinting thus having obtained one victory in a pight field, won two camps and holds of the enemies, conquered by force nine towns, and regained Preneste surrendered unto him, returned home again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, surnamed Emperor, which he brought from Preneste, and set it up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated be-Etween the thrines of Jupiter and Minerva: and in a table of brafs fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: [T. Quentius Di-Etator, by the gracious help of Jupiter, and all the rest of the gods, won nine Towns.] So on the 20, day after his creation, he refigned up his Dictatorship.

Then was the affembly holden for electing of Tribuns Military with Cost authority, who were equally cholen from out of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P and C. Manlins, with L. Julius. The Commons yeelded C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Amiftius. Upon the two Manlii, forthat in blood and degree they were above the Commoners, and for favour more gracious then Julius, the province of the Volscians was best owed extraordinarily, without casting lots or parting together by agreement of the Collegues amongst them elves. Which both they them-F felves rued, and the Senators also (that would have it to) repented afterwards. For without any espials, sent out aforehand to icour the coasts, they had set forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen)a forraging, and when upon a falle alarm that those were beset & intrapped they marched themselvs apace after to their rescue & convoy, & kept not with them fill the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but disguised in the habit of a Roman souldier, had deceived them they fel headlong into a train and ambushment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made relitance with main force only in a ground of great diladvantage (giving & raking the like measure) they were killed & flain on either fide. But in themean time their enemies from another quarter entred the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly. & all through the rashness and unskilfulness of the leaders. G And what remained unfoiled for the fortune of the people of Rome; that was preferred by the hardy and resolute valor of the Roman souldiers only, without the help of general and commander. Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuse a Distator : but afterwards, when tidings cares, that all was whole & the Volicians quiet, and that it was well feen they knew not how to use giftory when they had it, no reo take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it self-both the Generals & the army were tent for home from thence & fo for the Volkians they were at reft afterwards. Only in the very end of the year, ther arole some new stir & fudden tumult by reason that the Prenestins having sollicited the people of the Latins, entred into sebellion again. In the same year the men of Setia made moan of them elves for want of people, H and thither new Coloners were affigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans fped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort; which the Tribuns Military chosen from our of the Commons had procured by reason that they were fo gracious and reverenced among those of their own coat and faction. All the reginning of the year following, was at the first on a light fire with hot discord and mutiny, when Sp. Farm, Quintins Servilius the second time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Clalius, M. Horatius and L. Geganin were Tribuns Military with Confuls authority. The matter and cause of which teditious broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition wheref, and to know to what fums they amounted, Sp. Servilus Prifeus, and Clatius Sieulus were made Ceniors, but Hopped I they were for doing any thing by occasion of wars. For first fearful messengers in all hattebrought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volk-lans were entred into the confines, and fell to poiling every where the territory about Rome. Notwithflanding which fear and fortaign terror, lo little were the civil discords appealed, that contrariwife the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of fouldiers, until they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that fo long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debt. When the Com, took hold once of this ealement and liberty, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volicians Country. So F_B . K rius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Amium. Q. Servitius and L. Geganius on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But onneither fide met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to forraging the Country, not here and there in feattering wife, as the Volicians had done, after the manner of robbers, at starts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth forfear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men and juftly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made, For the Volkians standing in fear, lest in the mean while they should be encountred with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers; But contrariwise, the Romans made stay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field fight, Having therefore burned up, in amanner, all the uplandish houses and granges, and some villages I also, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the sown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties ofmen, women, and cattel which they could light on without the walls they reduced their armies of both fides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had fome little respit to breath themselves in. But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old usury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Cenforshad set out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yeeld unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Emylius, P. Valerius the M fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quimii Cincinnatii.

By the same strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger fort took the military oath, to that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volícians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Satricum. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be fer out against all, sudden wars, if haply elfewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Æmylius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattefied in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them prefently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in fight, and were but only infome good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain so poured down with huge storms and tempells, that it parted both hosts asunder, N The morrow after began a fresh conslict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, flood to it as valiantly, and sped as fortunatly as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that road in amongfithem, brake their ranks; and when they were once difarrayed; the footmen displayed their enfigus, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans battel fet forward, fo much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, than the violence of the Romans was intollerable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and sattered: and flying not toward their camp, bur to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satricum they dislodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haste (asif 0 they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heeles; yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans, for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their rereward, or force them to flay. All Dehis, some days were spent in washing the Country. For neither were the Romans sufficiently pluvided with warlike engins of battery and artillery to affail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antiats. The

A Antiats, of one fide wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yeeld. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after follong peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own designments, without being hindered one of another, their frife was foon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhonest & dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and flood out fill to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antiats being well rid of these Councellors of their, so cross unto all wholsome courses, tending to their good and safery, yeelded up their town and country to the Romans. But B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars. nor keep the Volfcians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Satricum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy fight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy editices: onely the Church of Dame Mainta they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the facred habitations to impioufly. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tufonlum they got for very spight that they for laking the general counsel of the Latins, had not onely veelded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens C with them! And coming upon them on a fudden, while their gates were open, at the first shout thewhole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townimen with their Wives and Children were thither fled: and fent messengers to Rome with certificat to the Senat of this fudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tusculum: whereof L. Quintius and Servius Sulpitius, had the conduct. At Tulculum they found the gates fast shut against them, and the Latins, as men both befieging and befieged. And whiles of the one fide they intended the defence of the walls, on the other fide affaulted the Caftle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in sear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tulculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the D Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortrels out of hand, as being masters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Castle : and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both fides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tultulans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming hard under the walls, and affaying to break the bars of the gates. First, they scaled the walls and and gat upon them : after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that preffed fore upon them, having neither fivength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every mothers fon. So when Tasculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was E brought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make paiment out of their sods, they were adjudged and awarded to fatisfie their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the consideration. Wherenpon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and stoop to low, that there was not a witty and nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had to earneftly thor at and laboured for) no, nor fo much as to bear and fue for any offices of the Commons. So as the Senators now, feemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some few years, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this order side might not joy too much hereat, a small occurrent hapned between which (as it falleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprize of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambustus a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as also with the Common whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition and eflate) had two daughtersmarried forth : the elder unto Servius Sulpitius : the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and reckoning but yet a Commoner. And Fabius difdaining not this alliance and affinity, wan himself much love and favour among the Commons. Now it fell out so, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servins Sulpitius, then Trib Military: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, discourfing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpitius, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum or comon hal, rapped as the order was, with his rod at the door. When the yonger Fabia not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her fifter making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to fcorn. But that laughter (as womens minds, got wor, are foon kindled with a litle) fet her a work & hammered in her head.

pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her sitter happily wedded, and repented her own marriage; upon anill and sinifter judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbor and neerest of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better then he, Upon this discontentment and fresh heart-burning of hers, her father haply feeing her dismaid, asked her whether all was well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grief another way, (for that it flood neither with her love and kindness towards her fifter, to envy her eflate; nor yet with the reverent honor that the was to yeeld unto her husband, to find fault with herown) he with mild questioning came about her for, that he drew from her the truth: so as Deconfessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely, married not accor- 1 ding to her quality, but into an house uncapable both of worship and favour. Then Ambussas, comforting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheer, and faid, That ere it were long, the should see the same state, the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had seen already in her fifters house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son in law, joyning also unto them, L. Sextint, a flouryoung man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the State, by realon of the exceffive debts that men were grown into: for the redreffing and eafing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themfelves into the loveraign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, prefently to address themselves to the execution of these designments, considering that by endeavor and indu-K firy, the Commoners were climbed to that degree already, from when eif they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in vertue and proweffe. And for the prefent, it was thought good to make them, two Trib, of the Com, in which office they might open a way unto themfelves, for other dignities, So C. Lieinius and L. Sex. proposed laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when fo much was defaulked and deducted out of the principal, as The Laws of had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3, years A second, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no mannight hold in possession above 500, acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib, Military, I but of Coss. provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com, Matters all of right great weight and confequence, and such as without exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazzard to be loft, which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to startle. And laying their heads together both in publick confultation and privat conference, they could devile no other remedy. but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the stepping between and negative voice of some of the Tribuns. And so, to cross those bills aforesaid put up by these two Tribuns, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood. Who fo foon as they faw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextins, to give their fuffra. I ges, being well backed and guarded with the affiftance of the Senators, would fuffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other befides (as yearly they nied) to pass by the voices of the Commons, Thus the two Tribuns aforefaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vain) affembled the people together, and seeing their laws still nipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is ve-"ry well (quoth Sextins) and fince ye like fo well that these inhibitions may prevail so much: "we will likewise desend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my "I fabid. It "I trow, that this word [* Peta] shall do your clives no good at all: howsover now ye takes the negative great pleasure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and evermore sing that sweet concent of "mufick, And furely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was N no election at all but of Ædiles and Tribuns, and those both of the Commons, For Licinius and Sextim being chosen Tribuns again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and detolation of foveraign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whiles the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribuns still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were affeep for the time. The Coloners only of Velirre, upon fo long reft and quietness began to be lufty and wax wanton : and for that there was no army of the Romans stirring abroad, they not only made inrodes fundry times into the tetritory of Rome, but alio affailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchifed Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved effect-0 ally for very shame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yeelded at length, and permitted an affembly for election, to be holden by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Valeriis Who found not the Commons forractable in the mullering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and fet forward on their journey: drave the enemies not from Tusculum only, but forced them within their own walls befieged Velitre more straightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them,

A Howbeit, they that began the fiege were not able to wint the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military cholen, Q. Servilius, C. Venvius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quantius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any norable exploit at Veture, But the State at home flood in more dangerous terms than before, For befides that Sextim and Licinius the publishers of those laws aforelaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, Fabius alfo a Tribun Military, Stolo his wives father, was feen openly in the action, to fet forward and perswade for the fame laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the Colledge or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had croffed the proceeding of their how there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they we to do that dis-B band from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wits and amazed, being indeed the tongues and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were ichooled and taught their leftons at home : (to wit) That a great fort of the Commons were in the army at Veliere and ablent, and that the folemit Sellion of Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the fouldiers : to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, Sextius and being their own craftimafters, knew well enough by fo many years experience, how to manage Licinius and handle the minds of the Commons: and plied the chief of the Senators (produced forth before gainst the Sethe people) to hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they Weati- nators for the C ed and tired them out; Demanding, " how they could require to be allowed themselves to pol-common pro-" fels more then 500 acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst ple. "them? Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands, well neer, of 300. "Citizens: and a Commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessary honse " upon, and to serve for a place to bury his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was, that "the Commons oppressed with usury should yeeld their bodies to bear itons and suffer torment. se unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whol companies they should "be had away from the bar, condemned to thraidom; and Noble mens houses to become goals, " filled and pestered with prisoners? And wheresoever a Patritian dwelt, there should be a private of prison? These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice D charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering and delivery: "But these Senators say they (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either of getting more land still into their hands; or spoiling and undoing the Commons with usury, " until the Commons make once out of their body one Conful for to be the maintainer and pro-" tector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing let by: "as who by their priviledge of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and over-"threw their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal course taken, so long "as the Nobles keep the loveraign place of command, and the fword to firike whiles the poor "Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government be parted E "between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Com-"mon-weal. Neither is it reason that any man stould stand contented with this only, that in the « Election of Confuls, the Commonsare eligible and capable of the dignity : for in case, it be not concluded absolutly, that one Conful at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there wil " never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (fay they) that not with standing an Act made, That there should be Tribuns Military created rather then Consults, for this intent that Commoners " might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 44. years space, there  was not fo much as one of the Commoners chosen Tribun Military? And will any man beleeve "that they will of their own accord confer upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse) "that dignity in the disposing only of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribun F & Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way "unto the Confulthip, who thus long have held the (Confular) Tribunship so guarded as no man

"might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their

"I waded, that the KK, are banished indeed out of the City, and their freedom fully establish-"ed for ever to endure. For, from that dayforward shall the Commons be parrakers of all those "things, wherein the Nobles now furpats them: namely, foveraign role and authority, martial "renown, parentage and Nobility : great ornaments doubtlels, unto themselves to enjoy here in "this life : but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Posterity. . These and fuch like Orations when they faw to be plaufible, and willingly accepted, they prejected a new Statute, That in flead of the two Duumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be creared forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Sellion for enacting of all those Laws, they deterred until the army was returned, which lay then at the negentleore I

The fixth Book of T. Livius.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole bufiness about these new Laws, hung still in suspence, and was put offunto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonaltychole the same again, even those twain who had been the proposers of those Laws. And the Tribuns Military were thele, T. Quimius, Ser, Cornelius, Ser, Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Veturius. Prefently in the beginning of the year, they pur unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Collegues stepped between to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wit, the highest and absolute of K fice, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator, And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Amylius for General of the horse. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against so great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stont stomack and couragious heart. And having assembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wards to give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and fet him down. And after the matter was canwassed first, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribunsamong themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gainfaid the Law with their negatives voices; and that by how much in right the prohibition was the ftronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law- [givers : and when the first Tribes had given their voice (" Wirogain) affirmatively : then Camil Im, For as much as (quotti he) O Quivites, ye are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by * (As ge pro-pound) The form of an Afthe authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the priviledge of a negative voice and * Intercession by your departure and Secession, so now ye make it would and nothing worth, firmative voice even by the same force that ye got it by : I, chosen Dictator as well for your sake as for the whole in their feruti-Common-wealth, will assist your priviledge of Intercession, and by mine absolute authority maintain this your help and fuccour, now reverfed and overthrown, : If therefore C. Licinius and L. Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office: I will not in a meeting and affembly of the Commons, onceintermedle, nor bring in the authority, of a Dictator to the Magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all prohibition) to M figuisher here impose and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conquest of the enemy, I will not sufthe priviledge impose and give Laws unto the Cary, words notwithstanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tush thereat, and went of the Tribuns never the less forward with their enterprize, then Camillus throughly angred indeed, sent his Listors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning monsto denv withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead an army presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great tright, but it set their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he law no relenting on either fide he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the. Tribuns of the N Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it; that if M. Furius (as Dicta-*1250. Isterl. tor) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000 * Asses, I know not certainly. But I believe that he was terrified upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather then with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man to well given and of so good conscience, and al'o for that P. Maxlins was immediatly named Dictator in his stead. For to what end should Marlius have been created Dictator for that broil and fiir, wherein M. Farius had taken the foil before? Again, feeing the same M. Furius Was Dictator the next year following, doubtless, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and diffrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was o supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine; either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he saw himself to be bridled) or else he had not been able to have hindred so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Confuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down.

Between the former Dictatorship of Camillus now refigned up, and the new by Manlius accep-

A red and begun, there was an affembly of the Commons fummoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interreign: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was feen, which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned ulury and land, they granted to pass, but that other of a Commoner to be Conful, they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been duparched fully and established at once, but that the Tribuns faid directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horiemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators flormed hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to excule the matter unto rhem, alledging for himself the neer affinity and kindred that was between him and Licinius: faying also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consular. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius fo demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they fet the Commons on to be moth earnest and hotly bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, defired and sought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say, "That for these nine years they had stood, as it were, in battel array, and affronted the States "and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect er at all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole frength C "of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crossed "by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the Ci-"ty to the Velitern war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their "thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their sellow Tribuns withstood "them, norforraign wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath "given a good fore-tokening and prefage of a Conful Commoner, in electing his General of 66 horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt them-" felves, and delay their owngoods. Who might prefently if they would, have their City, their common Hall, and place of affemblies freed from these Creditors : yea, and their grounds re-"covered again from the unjust Land-lord; Which benefits and liberties, when are they like to weigh and efteem with thankful minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are to acecept the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and "honour, from the publishers and proposers thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of the people of Rome, to require to be eased themselves of Usury, and to be set in possession again of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave those old "Trib, by whose means they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not "only without honor, but also without all hope of honor. Let them first therefore set down with "themselves, and resolve, what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Trib.declare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly "as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chuse the same Trib again: and then would they enach & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their wil was to "accept of that and no more than which served each privat mans turn then there was smal need " or none at all to have them fill in office, with theenvy and grudging of 10 many. And to be short, "neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have "those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were firuck into their dumps and blank, for the very indignity to feethings thus go : At the last, one Appins Claudius Craffus (the tiephew or ions ion of that notorious Appins the Decemvir) upon a malicious mind and fell fromack, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to diffwade of Appius Clauthe matter. Rood up, and to this effect answered that so flout and peremptory speech of the Tri-diss against buns, in this manner. "It can be no flrange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirites, if that the Tribuns of which hath been the only thing at all times objected by feditions Tribuns against our house, I the Commons, "also should hear at this present : to wit, that the whole name and linage of Claudii, have ever from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common-weal, than the Majesty and honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always fet and opposed themselves against the good "and well-fare of the Commons, Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny and difavow: namely, that we, fince the first time that we were enfranchised Citizens, and therwith at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavoured and frained our felves, that it might be faid and that truely, that the honor and dignity of that state and degree, into which it was your good pleasure we should be incorporate, and graced with, was by us augmented, rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine own behalf, and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirites, that (unless a man would "think whatloever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as if they were meer aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practifed nothing, witting and willing, either whiles we lived privat, or during the time we bare office, prejudiciall to commonalty: and that neither in deed not word we can be juffly charged to have wrought and "contrived any thing contrary to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out cross against your will and mind. And that one of them must needs perforce be created out of the Com. and in the "election of both, the Nobles may be overflipt? What fociety is this, what community and par-"ticipation? Wil not this serve thy turn and content thee, that wherein thou hadft no title nor " interest alore, thou shoulds now have thy part : unless in seeking to have a portion, thou pluck "all unto thy felf? I fear me (quoth he) if both Confuls might be made of the Nobility, re "would thus none at all of the Commonalty. What is this elie but to say? Because willingly of " your felves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I wil bind you therefore of me N
" ceffity, to elect those whom otherwise ye would pass by. And what solloweth hereupon but this, that the Commoner who standeth with two Patritii, may plainly say, and that truly he is "not by voices chosen, but by vertue of a law, and so acknowledg no benefit received of the peo-" ple, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus feek they means to wring "your dignities from you, and not the way to sue for them: and would so obtain the greatest, as " that they might not be obliged & bound unto you for the least : and had rather get honours and " offices by advantage taking and cunning fleights, then by their own vertue, defert, and wor-"thiness. But there is some one that scorneth to be pried and looked into, and to be considered "as he delerveth: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that contest " and fland in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himself to your censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntary to be constrained : offree to be thrall and fervil. I fpeak not of Lietnius and Sextius: whole years of their continual government ye retkon funds, and mark up in the Capitol, as they used fometime, to count the years of the Kings reign, But what is he this day in the City, of so base, so abject and low condition that by the advantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consulthip than we and our children have? As for us truly ye may fometime mits of chufing us, would you never fo fain : but for them or ye must needs, yea, though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignity

" and unworthiness of the thing; For, dignity and worthiness, I take, to be matters properly to men pertaining. What shall I speak now of Religions, and of the solemnity of the Anipices, which imply a meer contempt and injury done to the immortal gods? Who knoweth not, er that by the approbation of the gods, tellined by flight of birds, this City was fiff founded? "that by the fame Auspices, all hath been ordered and directed, as well in war abroad, as in reace at home? And who be they that have to do with these tokens and prelages, by ancient cultom "and tradition from our forefathers? Fortooth even the Nobles and none e.fe. As for the Magi-"frates of the Commons, none are chosen with regard of flight, 1 ght, and teeding of the birds. "But to us, they do so properly belong, that not only those Magittrates of the Nobles, which B"the people create, they do not otherwise elect ut by observation of the birds; but we also our " felves, without the affent and voice of the people, do nominate an Interfex by means of the ce birds: yea, and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which thele "Commons use not in their very offices. What then meaneth he elie, but to take these Auspicia out of the City, who by creating Commoners to be Confuls deprive the Nobles thereof, who only may have and use them? Now let them mock on and fooff at our religions. Let them deride our Ceremonies. What makes matter (fay they) if those pullets peck or eat not? What if they "come somewhat late out of their coup or cage? What if a bird sing auk or crow cross and con-"trary? How then? A great piece of matter furely. Small things, I confess they be: but as "fmall as they are, our an effors by not contemning them, have brought this C. W. to a flou-" rishing state. And we now adays, as if we stood not in need of the grace and savour of God, " poliute all holy rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our prelats and high Priefts, our Au-"gurs, and King at facrifices be created(it skilleth not how) even out of the common multitude: "Let us fet upon any mans head (it matters not whole, so he come in likeness of a man) the Mitre of Jupiter his Flamin. Let us commit the keeping of the Anciles or heavenly shields, and the " fecret fanctuaries : let us commit the gods themselves and the charge of their holy service to "those, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impiety. Let no lawes be published nor "Magiltrates created tolernly, with regard of birds at all, and of the wil of the gods. Nor in the " Centuriate affemblies holden by degrees, and Curiat-meetings by the wards and parishes; let " not the Senators be Prefidents and have their authority and royal affent. Let Sexcius and Liciof nius, like Romulus and Tatius raign together, as fellow KK. in the City of Rome, because they "give away so freely, the monies, lands and territories from others. So sweet and savory it is to Frey upon other mens goods. Never consider they, nor look so far into the matter, that by one "of their goodly laws, our fields wil be defart and waste, by ejecting and dispossessing the right-"ful land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting "forth of money shal be abolished. And then farewel all humane society, commerce and inter-"course whatsoever. In these respects therefore, thus I conclude, and would counsel you, in any "wife to ftop, frustrate and disamul the overture and proceeding of these laws: and in so doing, "Ipray God bless and speed you wel. This Oration of App us thus far only prevailed, that the time of publication of these Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the same Tribuns Sextius and Li-E cinius, being chosen again the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted, That of the The Decem-Decemvirs for divine service and Church matters, some should be created of the Commons: So, virs created five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they seemed to have gained already one good sep onward unto the Consulship.

The Commons contenting themselves with this victory, yeelded unto the Senators, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls, there should be elected Tribuns Military, So there were created A. and M. Cornslii the second time, M. Geganius, P. Manlius, L. Veturius and P. Valerius the fixth time. At what time, when as (but for the fiege of Velitre, which was like to be for service a long piece of work, rather then for iffue, doubtful in the end) the Romans were at test for any forraign troubles, the sudden and un ooked-for news of the Gauls war, drave the City to chuse M. Furins Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horsemen, T. Quintius Pennut. Claudius writeth that this year the Gauls were fought with, about the river Anio: and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which, T. Manlins in the fight of both armies flew in fingle fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance, and despoiled him of his coller of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to beleeve, that this exploit was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battel given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Albans land: where the Romans had neither doubtful nor dangerous victory, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thousands of this barbarous nation were flain in field, many also sell upon the sword in their campatter it was won. Some were feattered and fled, and those most (who took the way to G Apulia) faved themselves from the enemy, both by flying to far, and also for that upon sear they were so distracted and parted one from another. The Senators and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictator should triumph. Who scarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City. For after many sharp bickerings and contentions the Dictator and Senat both, were overmatched and overcome, yea, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforesaid. And also in despite of the Nobili- first Commoty and do what they could, there was an affembly held for election of Coninls: in which L. Sex- ner that was tius was created Conful, the first Commoner that ever fat in Confuls chair. But the brois cholen Conful

Raid not there. For by reason that the Nobles denied to approve & give affent thereto, the matter H was like to grow unto a Secession and general departure of the Commons, yea, and to other searful tearms and perilous threats of civil wars and inteffin troubles, Howbeit, by means of the Dictator, the flames were quenched and the discords appealed, upon these capitulations. Imprimit, that the Nobility should accord unto the Commons, to have one Consul from among themselves, Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the Parrisis create a Pretor or Lord chief Justice for over and determiner in causes within the City. Thus when after long anger the two states of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (&good cause they had verily as everany time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to fet out those most stately [Roman] playes. And whereas before I they had continued but three daies, to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Ædiles of the Commons refused that charge & excused themselves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice, That they would most gladly do that service and honor to the immortal gods, so as they might be made Ædiles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator should propose unto the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Ædiles, and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that year, what soever passed, should be ratified by the soveraign assent of the Senators.

WO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorship and Adileship of the Chair; were adjoined to the rest. The City was fore visited with the pestilence: which was more noted by reason of Furius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereof, whiles they fought to procure by brinrius Camilius who aleasinerein. I no remeia anacha whereay, while is not jought to procure by briseing in new and frange Religions, at length they devised flee-playes, which then first were set forth.

M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons, arrested L. Manuius for his exceeding rigour in taking muster of souldiers: and for constining and hardly interacting his own son, T. Manlius, for no crime or hainous offence. And the young man himself, whose constining and misself age was taid unto his father charge, entred the bed-chamber of the said Tribun, drew his Skean and forced him to swear unto him, y that he would let fall his fuit and proceed no further. Then all mischiefs intended, were laid apart and badan end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a Courfer, roch headlong into the wide gaing chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and so it presently filled up again. The same young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribun, entred into combat with a French-man, that who agreeaum faire from an soudiers to findle fight, flew hims took from him his colar of Gold, which he wave about his neck afterwards himselfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolowas condemned by a law of his own making, more were agaen. FOULILLA and EUVILLA. For which vertue and valorous Ait, he was the year next following created Consul, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Carthaginians. The Campaines being warred upon by the Samnites, craved aid of the Senat against them: and when they couldnot speed, peelded their City and Territory to the people of Rome. The seventh Book of T. Livius.

Ere ensueth a year of especial note and mark, for the Consulship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretorship and Ædileship of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Confuls. The Commons bettowed the Confulfhip upon L. Sextime for his good service, in propounding the law, whereby that promotion was first ob-B tained. The Nobies conferred the Pretorship upon Sp. Furin Camillus the ion of Marcus: and the Ædileship upon Cn. Quintius Capitalinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, personages of their own order and degree: So gratious were they with the people in Marsheld. L. Sextim had companion with him in government, L. Emilius Mamercus one of the Senators. In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls, who at the first ranged abroad over all * Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together : as alio concern- * Puglia. ing the Rebellion of the Hernicks. But all matters being put off on purpose, until a further time, because nothing should be done by this new Conful a Commoner, all things were still and quiet. as if it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Conful of the Commons, the Nobility had got to them-C selves three Magistrats, all of the Patritii, sitting like Contuls, with their pursed and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of estate, And as for the Pretor besides, as L. chief Justice to hear and decide causes, he was fellow with the Confuls, and with the same Auspices and authority created. Hereupon the Senat was abashed to be instant and to enforce that Ædiles of the chair should be chosen our of the Nobility. And first it was agreed amongst them, that every second year they should be elected forth of the Commons: Asterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Genutius and Q. Servilius were Coff. and all at good rest for any home-sedition or forrain war: behold, lest they should at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague; In which died, as men fay, one Cenfor, one Ædible Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: besides, many a dead corps from among the multitude, was can riedforth, proportionable to the rest. But above all, the bitter death of Camillus and much lamen- The death of ted (notwithstanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) canfed this pestilence to be M. Faring Casmuch spoken of and remembred. For he was (in truth) the only person in all fortune both of pro- millus. sperity and adversity, as well in peace as war: a rare and singular man before his banishment, and during the same more samous and renowned : either in regard that the City had a miss of him, and being raken by the enemy in his absence sought unto him for his help; or in respect of his happiness, in that together with his own restitution home he therewith restored his natural country. And after this, for 25 years space (for so long he lived afterwards) he bare himself answerable to the title of so great glory: accounted worthy to be surnamed and reputed a second founder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. All this year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpitius E Peticus, and C. Licinius Stolo were Confuls, the fickness continued. By reason whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that for to obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Lectiflern folemnized, which was the third fince the City was first founded. But when by no device of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the fickness affwaged; their minds and consciences were so possessed with superstition, that among other pacifications and appearings of the heavenly ire, the stage-playes (a strange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time used only to behold the solemn games and fears of strength and activity, in the great Lifts or Race called Circus) were (as men fay) first begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings Stage platers lightly are) a small thing (God wot) it was at first: without long and metre, without gesture and first Rome action surable unto song and verse, and the same also meer outlandish. For the players, who were F lent for out of Hetruria, as they danced the measures to the minstel and found of flute, gestured not undecently withal, after the Tuscan fashion. But in process of time the youth began to imitate and counterfeit them, jefting pleasantly besides one with another, and singing in rude rimes and disordered metre: and their gesture was sorting with their jests and ditties. Thus was this thing first taken up, and thus with much use and often exercise, practifed. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artificial professors of this feat, were called Histories, of Historia Tulcan word, which fignifieth a player or dancer. But these uttered not (as they nied afore time) in their turns one after another, disordred, consused, and rude verses, like to the loose and baudy Fescenine rimes: but went through and rehearsed out, whole Satyrs, full of musical measures, with a fet concent of long also, to the instrument of the minstrel and with gesture agreeable there-Junto, Certain years after, Livius, who was the first that after the use of Satyrs, ventured to set [Andronicus] forth an Enterlude, of some one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himtelf (as they were all no doubt in those dayes) the Author and Actor both, of his own veries and longs: But being so often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarse again, and lost his voyce, he gat leave to fet a boy to fing before the minstrels. And so being filent himself, he acted the fong with more agility and nimblenes of motion a good deal: for, not employing his voyce, he had no hindrance of liberty in gesture. Then began the players to have others to fing, and they themselves used their voyces only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue-wife, After that, by this order taken and Law of Playes, they came from laughter and pleafant H conceited Mirth, and that this passime and sport turned by litle and litle to a methodical Art and profession: Then the youth leaving to Comodians, the acting of parts in Enterludes, began after the old manner to let flye, one at another, merry fcoffs and jells, interlaced within their rime and meeter, which thereupon were afterwards called Exodia, and were inferted commonly in the Atellan Comedies. Which kind of sport the youth learned first of the Ofei: and having once taken it up, they held it fill, and would not fuffer it to be diffayned and dishonested by common players. And hereof cometh it, that the Actors in the Atellane Interludes were neither displaced out of their owntribe, nor made Ærarii, but served in the wars, and have the Cities pay, as if they were not base Comercians, and Profesiors of infamous players crast. Thus have I thought good, I among the small beginnings of other things, to set down the Original of Stage-players also: that it may appear, that the thing arining from a confiderate entrance, is grown now to this foolery and excellive iumptuouineis, as hardly can be defrayed by most rich and wealthy Kingdoms. And yet these players at first, employed about a religious buliness, neither rid mens minds of scruple and superstition, nor eased their bodies one jot of sickness. But rather, when by occasion of an overflow and inundation of the Tyber, the Circus or Theatre was drowned, and their playes in the very midst hindred and interrupted, this occurrent mightily troubled and affrighted them, as if the Gods had turned away their face and countenance, and rejected all their endeavours in these appealings of their wrath and indignation. Therefore in the time that Cn. Genutius, and Emylius appealings of their whath and thought time, when mens minds were bussed and troubled more in K feeking means to pacify the wrath of the Gods, than their bodies vexed with diseases; the elder fort and grand figniors called to mind that in old time there was a plague asswaged and gave over, by the driving and fastning of a spike or great nail by the Dictator. The Senat upon a religious devotion perswaded herewith, caused a Dichator to becreated, for to fasten the nail aforesaid. And there being chosen L. Manlius Imperiosus, he nominated for his General of Horsemen, L. Pitious driving narius. There is an old law written with ancient letters, and in antique words, That the chief Pretor for the time being, should in the 'Ides of September drive a spike or nail, Well, a nail was driven, and fluck fast on the right side of the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, on that hand where as Minervas Chappel Handeth. That nail, because in those dayes there was but little writing shewed, as they say, the number of the years. And thereupon that Law was set up in Miner-L was Church, for that Minerva was the inventrels of numbring. And Cintint a diligent writer of fuch monuments, and a fludious Antiquary, affirmeth, That at Volfinii there fluck fuch spikes to be seen in the Temple of Nortia, a goddess among the Tuscans, to quote and represent the number of the years. Now, as concerning the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, M. Horatius the Conful (by an act in that behalf provided) dedicated it, the year next enfuing the expulsion of the Kings. Afterwards, the folemn manner and cultome of fastining a nail, was transferred from the Consults to the Dictators, as to the greater and more absolute Magistracy. And in process of time, this custome being discontinued, it was thought a thing in it self worthy, for which a Dictator for some war, and not to free the people from their scruple of conscience: and intending himself war against the Hernicks, plagued the youth with a grievous muster : until at length all the Tribuns of the Commons taking against him, opposed themselves: and were it by force, or for very shame he relented, and resigned up his room. Neverthelels, in the entrance of the year next sollowing, when Q. Servilius Hala, and L. Genutius the second time were Confuls, M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons arrested Martins. His cruelty in taking of the musters was odious, not only for the loss and dammage that the citizens sustained thereby, but also for rearing and mangling their bodies, partly by iconrging them with rods who answered not to their name, and partly clapping irons upon them in prison. But above all, his own cruel disposition by nature was hateful, and the furname (Imperiofus) offenfive, especially to a free City. This name he got by N plain shew of his cruelty, exercised no less upon his neerest friends and kinsfolk, yea, and his very own bloud, than upon strangers. For amongst other matters, the Tribun laid fore to his charge, that having a young man to his fon, detected of no lewdness and dishonest life, him he had banished (as it were) out of the City, from his house and home, debarred from the common Hall and pen light of men from the company of his mates and companions, fet him to drudgery and fervil work, and betaken him as it were, into a prison and house of correction: where, a Dictator his son a young Gentleman highly descended by this daily milery of his, wastaught to know, that he had indeed a Lord'y and imperious Sir, to his father, "And for what great offence, I " pray you? Because he was not so fair spoken nor all the readiest with his tongue. Which in-" firmity and defect of nature, ought not a father to have born withal and cloaked (if there had o "been any goodness, any common humanity in him) rather than to punish it, and by rough " handing, and sharp ulage, to make it more known and notorious? Why? even the very bruce "beafts, if it chance that any of their breed or young ones prove but untowardly, feed and che-" rish them fill nevertheless. But as for this L. Manlins, he augmenteth one inconvenience and " default in his fon, with another: whom being but foft and flow of nature, he keepeth down the "more: and that litle life and small metal that is in him, he goeth about to quench and dull at

A These bitter complaints and accusations moved the patience, and stirred the stomacks of every man elfe, fooner than the young man himself. Who contrary-wife was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles, thus to incur the ill will and obloquy of the people. And that all the World, both Heaven and Earth might know, that he defited rather to succour and help his father, than to affilt his adversaries and foes, he entreth into a course beseeming and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rustical mind, Which, although it sayour nothing of Civility, yet for his kindnels and dutiful piery to his father, delerveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknown to every one of the honfe, with a good skein close by his fide, to the City he goes: and from the gate freight wayes directly to M. Pompo ites the Tribun The kindness

B his house. Hexelleth the Porter, that he must needs speak with his Master out of hand, willing of T. Manlins him to let him understand, that T. Manlius the son of Lucius, was there. And being immediately to his father. let in, (for the Tribun hoped, that the fon was throughly angred with his father, and brought new complaints, and onematter or other against him, or some devise and overture, how to proceed in the commenced Action) and falutations passed to and so between the Tribun and him, he said, that he was to talk with him apart out of allumens hearing. So the room being voided, and all commanded to depart faremough out of the way, he drawerh out his skein; and leaping alost upon the bed, flood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatned presently to give him the stab, unless he would swear the oath he should tender unto him, namely, never to call an Affembly or Hall of the Commons together about his fathers inditement, or impanel a Jury against him. C The Tribunaffrighted (iceing the naked weapon glittering before his face himsen all alone and unarmed, the other a tall and lufty young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feared as the rest, sool-hardy, and prejuming upon his strength) took the oath in that form as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confessed (for his excuse) that by this means he was forced in spight of his heart, to surcease his suit, and give over his enterprise. But the Commons were not so much offended at the son, sor giving such an adventure in his fathers quarrel-but they could have been more contented and better pleased; that it had lies in their power to have passed their voyces, for the condemnation of so cruel and proud a prisoner, as they had under their hands. And the more praise-worthy was this delign of the ion, because to great rigor of the father, wrought no alienation at all in his heart from the affection at duty that he owed upto D him. So not only the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the young man turned to his own honour and preferment. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the "Tribups * A Tribunia or Colonels should be chosen by voyces of the legionary souldiers (for aforetime, as at this day, a legion, cal-the Generals themselves made them, whom they call Ruffulr) in fix places (for so many weep cle-led childrens, cted) he obtained the fecond room: and that, in regard of no defert otherwile, either at home or i a Colonel or abtord, which might win him this favour as who had fear his rooth in the leader of a abtood, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the country altogether, 1000 [60st-far from the civil society of men.

The same year, by earth-quake or some other forcible violence, the common place called Forum, clave and opened wide, welneer in the mids, and link down to an exceeding depth: neither could that chink or pit be filled up, by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and E brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonifhed by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greatness of the people of Rome confifted. (For the wifards prophesied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain fure for ever, they should dedicate and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place,) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardy knight M. Curtius his and martial young Gentleman, rebuked them therefore, because they doubted whether the Ro- valor and remans had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after filence made, he lift up flution, his eyes, and beheld the Temples of the immortal Gods, scituat neer to the Forum, and the Capitol likewife; and firetching forth his hands, one while toward Heaven, another while to the gaping chinks and gulf in the earth, toward the infernal spirits beneath, he offered and devoted him-F felf to affured death. And mounting upon a brave courier, as richly trapped and fet out, as possibly he could devise, armed as he was at all pieces, he leapt Horse and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, threw in after him fundry gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plenty. The place was after called Curius Lecus, of his name, and not of that Curius Lecus Curius Maisus in the old time, who was a fouldier under Titus Tains. If I could by any means fearch out the truth, I would not spare for any pains in that behalf. But now seeing that by reason of antiquity the certainty is not fully known, we must go by the common voyce and report of men. And verily the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and fresher tale, than the other.

After the expiation of so great and prodigious a wonder, much consultation there was in the G Senate that year, as concerning the Hernicks: for having fent their Heralds unto them for restoration of harms done, but to no effect, they determined with all convenient speed to propose unto the people, for to proclaim war against the Hernicks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voyce liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that service and exploit fell to L. Genutius his lot, to undertake. Now for that he was the first Conful of the Commons that by his own auspices and conduct should manage war, the City was in great expectation of the sequel and iffie and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey, they were to judge, whether they had done well of amilis to communicat these dignities with the Commons.

L. Genutius Conful flain, But it fortuned to that Genutius being with great preparation and power fet forth against the ene-mies, was entrapped by an Ambuicado, his legions upon a sudden tear unlooked for deteated, himielf (the Conful) environed round about, and flain by them that with not whom they flew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not so pensive and sorrowful for the common calamity, as they fumed and took on most infolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Conful: and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: "Now let them ego and create Confuls again out of the commonalty, and translate the Anspiria whither they "ought not. What? Becaule the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and di-"possessed of their dignities, could so inauspicate and irreligious a law prevail likewise against the "Gods immortal? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and main- I "tained their power, their deity and Auspices: which were not so soon medled withal, and pol-" luted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain "also, were vanquished and overthrown; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their " folemn Elections of Magistrats confusedly, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble "houses. These speeches both Councel House and common place rung again withal, So the Conful Servilius with confent of the Nobles named for Dictator Appine Claudius, who had aforetime in an Oration before the whole affembly of the Commons difficult waded the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the milhap of that counsel, which was by him mifliked and reproved. A muster was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and these new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under K the leading of C. S. I pitim the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in scornful and contemptuous manner, close under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be mafters of the same; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the fouldiers stomacks were full they made a fally our against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came fo far thorse of their accompt, that they had no hope to affail, no, nor approach the rampier; and so in diffary they diffuse bed and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reenforced double. The Dictator in a solemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his souldiers for defending their tents fo manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves so highly commended according I to their deferts, and also whetted on the reft to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing slack to prepare themselves to sight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encreased their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw iword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves confisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial stour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus reserved to intend the fight and nothing else, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and strain them. M felves above the ordinary carriage of fouldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and manhood might be more seen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both fides, whiles the Roman Horsemen charged and recharged again, but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battailons. Thus when the service on Horseback, proved less in effect than in attempt, they asked the advise and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horses, and with a mighty shout, ran forth before the ensigns, and renewed the battel asress. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary bands opposed themselves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight N maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what flaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one fide as of the other, the loss was greater for the quality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common fouldiers, as if they had shitted from themselves the whole consider; and betaken it to the vanguards only, reposed their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was smitten down and dyed in the place, but morewere hurt and wounded. "At last, those Horsemen that dismounted, sell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained else " besides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force "them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of fervice looked they for? Why leapt "they out fo luftily and bravely into the forefront before the enfigns? and fought in the place of 0 others? With these words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a fresh shout let foot forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies to retreat and lose their standing: thento give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to fay, being to equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and gave the victory : unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other, The Romans had the Hernicks in chase, all the way long, so far as to their camp : but

A because it was far in the evening, they staid from assailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by facrifice gather any affured token of Godsfavour, he founded not the battel before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morrow, after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned : only some hurt and wounded souldiers were found lest behind. But one troup of them that forfook their enfigns (when as neer unto their walls and forts their banners were discovered, slenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear stragled all about, and shamefully fied away. And yet this victory of the Romans cost them well the setting on, and spent some bloud : for they lost a sourth part of their men: and that which was no small dammage unto them, some of the Roman Horsemen also were

The next year following, when C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius Calvus the Confuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Forentinum a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindnesses ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Heralds (after restitution and amends demanded) to fend defiance, and proclaim wat against the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintius Penus was Dictator that year, and Serg, Cornelius Maluginensis General of his Horsemen, it is agreed upon by all authors, Macer Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an allembly for Election of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius: became when his fellow Consul made hast C to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his own Confulthip, it was thought good to withstand and meet with his naughty defre in that behalf. But Licinius [Macer] in uturping to his name and family, that praise and commendation, maketh himself to be of less credit in writing of the reft: especially, seeing that in none of the old records, I find mention of any such matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gauls tumuituous war. For certainly that year they encamped themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of * Anio, in the way Salaria. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacation, * True in. because of these troubles of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger fort; and with a puissant army departed the City, and upon the very banck on this side of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they D would not break down on either part, left they should be thought fearful cowards. But about the feizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of boths sides, who should be matters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as loud as ever he could fer out a throat, maketh this challenge: Now (quoth he) let the braveft gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of us twain may shew whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome; held their peace a good while, both abashed to resule the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a fingle fight. Then T. Manlius, the fon of Lucius, even he who released his father from the Trithus troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and express r. Minitus to E "commandment (quoth he) O Noble Soveraign, I would never pressure to fight out of my ranck that. General, and flanding, no, not if I should see affured victory before mine eyes: but if it will please your Excellency to give me scene, I will show unto that beast yonder (that so proudly and Institut is the second seed to the seed of the seed "come forth leaping before the enemies enligns, and braving as you see) that I am descended of "that house and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the foil and turned them down the "Cliff Tarpeia. Then faid the Dictator unto him, God bleffe thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carrieft both to father and Country: Go on I fay, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions holp to arme the young Gentleman. A light footmans shield he takes unto him, and a spanish blade by his side, more handsome to fight short and close. Being thus armed F and fet out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaul, set all upon joy ful soolishly, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) scornfully lolling and blaring out his tongue. Then the rest departed every man to his own quarter and ward: The combat and the two armed Champions were left in the midft, more like a festival spectacle and pageant between f. to behold, than any fight in field, fuiting to the manner, guife, and law of combat, confidering Manlius and a they were not equally matched, if a man should judge by the eye and outward view. The one of them of personage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of sundry colours and gay, his hatthem to perionage mignry and exceeding tail, mass of anisotropic or a man of a middle "fla- six foot high, and glittering and all damasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of a middle "fla- six foot high, ture of Souldiers, nogreat shew of armor, and that rather fit and handlome, than gaudy to be- or five for hold: without any hooping, singing, and joyous vaunting of himself, without vain-flourishes and ten inches. G and shaking of his weapons in the air: but he had an heart full of resolute courage, stomack, and close anger within, reserving all his fierceness and eagerness unto the very combat and tryal of fight. As they flood thus between the two armies, and so many men all about looking on, in doubtful suipence between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain a lost over the other, ready to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the fword of his enemy coming against him, and let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that it re-four ded again upon his shield, and did no harm at all. The Roman bearing his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having smitten the nether part of his enemies target, and turned it aside, got with his whole body close within him, and without the danger of being $_{

m H}$ hur: and when he had wound himself between his enemies body and his swords point, he redoubled one or two foins, and thrush him up into the belly at the groin, and so overthrew him.

There lay the Gaul along, and took up a great ground in length. When he was down, without any further mangling and tormenting his carcais, he despoiled him only of his colar of gold, which embrued asit was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this fight were aftonied. The Romans with great cheerfulness came forth of their wards and quarters to meet their champion, and with great praise and congratulation brought him before the Dictator. And as they merily call forth (as the manner of fouldiers is) certain plealant ditties, ballad-wife, but without artificial skill of portry, they were heard to furname him * Torquatus: I which afterwards was taken up and commonly uled, and became an honorable name to his pollerity, and the whole houle belides. Befides all this, the Dictator bestowed upon him a coronet of * Wearing 2 gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the army, highly and wonderfully comcolar, or Carmended that fight of his, And certainly, that combat was of such consequence, and made so much to the event of the whole war, that the night next following, the hoft of the Gauls, fearfully abandoning their tents, departed into the Tyburtin country; and being drawn into a fociety of war with the inhabitants of "Tybur, and liberally by them relieved with victuals, they passed within a while into Campania. Which was the cause that the next year, C. Petilini Balbus the Consul (when his fellow M. Fabius Ambustus was by lot, sent with commission against the Hernicks) led an army, by the appointment of the people, against the Tybuttins. To the aid of whom, when K the French were returned out of Campania; there was foul spoil and havock made in the Lavican, Tulculan, and Alban territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburtins. And whereas the State stood well contented that the Consul should be the General commander, against these enemies the Tyburtins ; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls, caused a Dictator for to be created. And that was Q Servilus Hala, who named for his General of Horsemen, T. Quinting. And by the authority and affent of the Senators, he vowed to fet out the great games, in cale he fred well in this war. The Dictator having commanded the Conful with his army to tarry fill, that by his own conduct of war he might keep in the Tyburtins, took the oath of all the younger people: and there was not one refused to go to the war. Not far from the gate Collina was this battel fought, in the fight of their Parents, Wives and Children, Great incouragements, L doubtless, to cheer up and animate men, abient and far off: but now before their eyes, partly, for shame, and partly, for pitty and compassion, they sente souldiers all on fire. After much blood-shed on both sides, at the last the army of the Gauls turn back : and being put to flight, they made hast to Tybur; the very strength and fort of the Gauls war. But as they fled stragging one from another, they were encountred by the Conful Petilius not far from Tybur. And when the > puissance. The Dictator having highly commended the Consuls, both in the Senat-house and also in a publick affembly of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his own Acts unto M them, gave up the Dictatorship. Petilius, obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tiburts, For Fabinit was thought infficient, that he should enter into the City Ovant, in a pety triumph. The Tyburrins scoffed and made good game at the triumph of Petilius. For, "where "was it (fay they) that they encountred and joyned battel with us? There went forth indeed out "of the City gates a few of us to behold the flight and fright of the Gauls : but feeing our lelves "alfoto be ferupon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired back, and " and got the City over our heads. And was that such a doughty deed, that the Romans should "think, it deserved a triumph? But that they may not deem it still, so noble and so wondrous an " Act to make some flir, and raise a tumult in the enemies gates: they should themselves see thort-" ly greater fearfulne's, even under their own walls. Hereupon, the year following, when M.Po-N pilius Lenas, and Cn. Manlius were Confuls, at the first watch of the night, they came from Tybur

Tyburtins islued forth to succour them, they with the rest were beaten into the Town, Likewise the other Conful Fabius, first in small skirmishes, and at last in one notable pight field, vanquished

the Hernicks, at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole in warlike manner to the City of Rome. This sudden occurrent, happing to fearfully in the night feaion, stroke a mighty terrour into them that hastily awakened out of sleep. Besides, many there were that wift not, either what enemies they were, or from whence they came. Howbeit they cryed Alarm with all speed, on every side. The gates were fortified with warders, the walls manned with strong guards. When as early in the morning they were descried to be but a mean number of enemies before the Town, and those none other but Tyburtins; the Confuls sallied out at two gates, and affailed both wayes their forces, as they were now come under the walls ready to scale. Then was it seen that they were thither come presuming rather on the vantage of the time, than trufting in valour and manhood: fo little were they able to abide the first brunt and o charge given by the Romans. Furthermore, it was well known that this their comming turned to the Romans good: for, the discord that was now breeding between the Senators and the Com, for fear of this fo neer danger was quireftaied. But in the next war that enfued the enemies came after another fort, and were more terrible to the fields and country, than to the City, For the Tarquinians over-ran all themarches of the Roman pale, wasting and spoiling all those parts, especially that border upon Herraria. And after reditution & amends demanded but to no effect, the new Coff, C. Fabius & C. FI mins, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war against them. The rumors A also of the Gauls war began to berife. But amid these manifold and searful troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latins had peace granted unto them, upon their own fute : and from thence a great power was received according to the ancient league, which for many years space, they had let pass and discontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well frengthned, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Prenefte, and were fet down and encamped about Pedum. It was thought good, that C. Sulpitius should be chosen Dictator, named by C. Plantius fent for to the same purpose. Unto whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his Horiemen. These marched against the Gauls with the choice souldiers of two Consular armies. This was a lingring war and protracted longer a great deal, than both parties liked of. At the

B first, the Gauls only were sharp set and eager of battel but afterwards the Roman souldiers, by rushing into fight and skirmish, exceeded far the fierceness and forwardness of the French, The Distator was nothing pleafed herewith, to put all upon the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, especially having to deal with that enemy, whom tract of time and disadvantage of the place, made daily worse and worse: being unprovided besides of victuals and making long abroad withour any fenced fort: moreover of that flomack and conflitution of body, as lerved wholly for expedition and quick service, and by small delayes waxed feeble and faint. Upon these considerations the Dictator held off fill and drew the war on length, and had proclaimed a grievous punishment if any without his express commandment should fight with the enemy. The fouldiers could not well brook this: but first within their wards and watches began among themselves to carp at

C the Dictator: and otherwhiles they let flie at the LL, of the Senate in general, blaming them for their direction, in that the Confuls had not the managing of this war. They have chosen indeed (fay they) a fingular General on set purpose, a Captain alone, who thinks whiles he sitteth still and doth nothing, the victory will fall from Heaven, or flie into his very lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to cast out the same, yea, and worse speeches too and more malepart: namely, that they would either fight, and ask the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battel to Rome. The Centurions also joyned themselves to the souldiers : and not only in conventicles and knots together, there was whitpering and grumbling: but in the very * * A placei in Principia, yea, and within the quarter of the L. General his pavilion, were heard confused speeches, the campa together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full affembly, and from all

D parts to call and cry aloud, to go prefently to the Dictator: and that Sex, Tullius should in the name of the whole army speak unto him, as beseemed his vertue and courage. This Tullius now had been seven times already a primipilar or principal Centurion: neither was there in the whole army, of all those that served on foot, a man more renowned for feats of arms. He going before the army of footmensteppeth to the Tribunal. And when as Sulpitius marvailed not fo much to fee that company, as the leader of the company Tullius, who of all the fouldiers had ever been in belt order and most obedient, "This is the matter (quoth he) O Noble Dictator and nothing The Oration "e.fe, The whole army in general, supposing themselves by you condemned of cowardice, and in a of Six, Tullins " manner to their utter shame abandoned, and disarmed, have intreated me to plead their cause unto the Di-" before your Majesty. And I for mypart, I assure you, in case we might be charged to have lost thator.

E "ground any where, in case we had turned our backs upon the enemy, in case we had lost our en-"figns shamefully, would think it yet a reasonable suit to be obtained at your hands, that you "would give us leave to amend that which is amiss, to correct our former fault with hardiness and "valour, and by some fresh and glorious exploit, to cancel the remembrance of so soul a foil and " shameful dishonor. Even those very Legions that were deseated and put to flight at Allia, afterse wards in their return from Veis, recovered the same country of theirs by valour, which they had "once before lost through cowardice. But we by the goodnes of God, through the felicity of your "felf and the people of Rome, have hitherto kept both the army unfoiled, & honor unstained, And "yet I scarce dare say honour; if so be, that not only our enemies may with all reproachful tearms " fcorn and flout us, as if we were women pent in & mewed up close within our rampier but also F " you our General (the more is our grief) deem us your army to be heartless, handless & armour-

64 less and before any tryal of us made, to despair of us, as if you took your self to be a Commander " & Leader of a fort of maimed & feeble persons. For what else may we think of it, that you, an old "experiencedCaptain and a most valiant warrior, should sit, as they say, with one hand in another, "doing nothing for how soever the truth is indeed, more meet it is, that you should be thought to "doubt of our valor, than we of yours. But if this be not a device of your own fetting, but a publick "plot laid and some matter agreed upon among the Senators at home, rather than any war of the "Gauls, keepeth us away from thence, confined as it were from the City & our own houses: then "I beleech you what soever I shall say, you would think it as spoken, not by the souldiers to their "Lord General, but by the Commons to the rulers and Senators. Who may thus reply, that as ye

G " have your policies and counsels, so will they have their designs & wayes of their own likewise. "For who would think I pray you, that we are your fouldiers, and not your flaves; fent to war, and "not into banishment? If any set out the banner of wag unto us, lead us forth into the field, and "found the battel, ready we are to fight like men, and like Romans: but if there be no need of war, "we wil rather fit stil at home than in the camp. And thus much suppose as spoken to the Lords of the Senat But we thy fouldiers. O worthy General befeech thee first to give us leave to fight, then defirous are we to conquer and under thy flandard and conduct to conquer to prefent thee "with a glorious garland of lawrel, and in triumph to enter with thee into the City: and after thy

"chariot to go up with joy and mirth to the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, This Oration H of Tullius, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every fide, to found the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the marter in it leli good, but not handled in good manner; and for example sake not to be allowed; yet promited to latisfy the fouldiers defire. "And calling Tullins fecretly apart, questioned with him "What this matter meant, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly " besought the Dictator, notto think him to have forgotten either military Discipline, or his own "place, nor yet the Majesty of his Soveraign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himself away from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refused to be their speaker (who lightly resemble those that are their ring-leaders) it was only for sear lest some other should have kept in place, T "fuch as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to let up for their Captains. As for himself, do " nothing he would, without the pleasure of the General. Howbeit, he would advise him to look "well about him, and carefully to fee to it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obedience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For confidering their hearts were " kindled already, and their bloud up, they would be their own carvers, and chuie themselves "both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the fooner. Whiles they were thus in fad communication, there happed two Roman fouldiers to take perforce from a Gaul certain lumpter Horses, which seeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye flones good flore. And thereupon rose an alarm from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was apace, on both fides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmish and battel K indeed, had not the Centurions speedily flickled them , and ended the fray. Upon which occurrent, the credit of Tullim with the Dictator was confirmed: and leeing the case would abide no delayes he proclaimed battel against the morrow. The Dictator notwithstanding he had yeelded to fight a field, as prefuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to devile with himself, and cast about every way, how by some stratagem he might strike a terrour among the enemies. And having a fubtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of others also, yea, and some even in our time, have used and put in practise. He gave order, that the mules fumpters should be taken off their backs, leaving only two course twillies or coverings upon them, The stratagem and letteth the muletors aloft thereon, furnished with the armour of certain captives, and fick L and diseased persons. Of these he made wel-neer one thousand, and joyned unto them one hundred good Horiemen. All thele, he chargeth in the night time to get above the camp into the hills, and among the Furs and woods, to bellow themselves close: and not to stir from thence, before that he gave them a fignal. Himself, so soon as it was day light, began with great wariness and considerate care to embattel and arrange his army in length along the very foot of the mountainst to the end, that the enemy might have the hills full against him. Thus having set out and directed these counterfeit cornets of Horse, to scare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner, than the other forces indeed; at the first, the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they faw them upon a fudden descended, they also, as destrous of fight, ran onforward presently to joyn battel, and be-M gan the fight before the Captains had sounded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, to that har ily they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictator been there in perfon. "Who called upon Sextsus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had "given his word unto him, that the fouldiers should in that fort fight? What is become (quoth "he) of theie, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battel? Where are those threats " now that they would begin to fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your "General himself calleth upon you as loud as he can, to fall to your business, and goeth armed be-" fore the enfigns in the vanguard: will any now follow after that erewhile would needs lead the " way afore? Fierce (I see well) incamp searful in the field. And no fable it was that they heard "him speak. Whereupon for very shame they were to pricked forward, that without casting any N perils, or minding preient danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This violence of theirs, as if they had been welneer out of their right wits, at the very first troubled and disordered the enemies. The Horsemen that were sent out hard after them, forced them to turn back, when they were once in disarray. The Distator himself seeing the battel of one fide to shrink, advanced forward with the enfigns against the left wing, unto which he law the main multitude to refort and gather together, and withal he gave the fign to them that were within the hills, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence also a new shout arose, and that they were feen to march fide-long overthwart the hill, toward the Gaulscamp; then for fear, left they should be shut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where M.V. lerius: the General of the Horsemen encountred and affronted them, Forhe seeing the right of wing discomfitted had set a compass about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterfeit shew of Horiemen, and by the muletors caught up, and came short home: but as many of them as fear drave through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battel was paft) cruelly flain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one, letting M. Farim afide, that triumphed niore worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Sulpitius. He confectated also in the Capitol a good weighty mass of gold, got out of the Gauls spoil, and compassed it within an enclosure of square

A stone. The same year, the Consulstikewise warred, but with diverse fortune and success. For by C. Plantins, the Hernicks were vanquished and subdued. But his companion Fabius fought rash, y and unad, ifedry against the Tarquinians. The loss in the battel received, was not so much, but that the Tarquinians sacrificed three hundred and seven Roman souldiers whom they took prifoners. This toul and shameful execution, caused the ignominy of the Romans defeat afore to be much more notable, and talked of abroad. Befides this lols, was the Roman territory much wasted (to help the matter, withal) by the Privernats, and after them by the Veliterns, who made fudden invodes into the Country. The same year also were two more Tribes added, Pompina and Publicia. The votive solemn playes or games likewite, which Marcus Furius the Dictator B had vowed, were then fet forth and performed.

Then and never before was the first law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribun of the A law against Commons, and that by the confent and approbation of the Senators, against the exceffive suit and ambitious feeambitious standing for dignities. By which law men supposed, that the ambition principally of king for offices certain persons new risen and of the first head, who were wont to hannt fairs and places of great of government. refort for that intent, was repressed and kept under. But the year ensuing, when C. Martius, and Cn. Manlius were Coniuls, M. Duellins and, M. Menenius two Tribuns of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not so well liked of the Senators, to wit, concerning Uvry of one in the hundred. But the Commons were fo much the more forward and A law against better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and befides those new wars the year before intend- Usury.

Ced, the Fainci were declared new enemies : and that, for two quarrels pretended against them; One, for that their youth had served against the Romans under the Tarquinians : the other, becan'e they had not delivered again those Romans which fled unto Filini, after their defeat and unincky fight, notwithstanding the Heralds had made claim unto them and demanded them. This Pro-intefell to Cn., Mantius. But Martius had the leading of an army into the Land of the Privemats, which by reason of long peace was unfoiled yet, and in very good state, and thereby enri hed his foundiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and flore that there was found he added his own bounty and liberality; in that he fet out nothing for the common Treatury, but favoured the foundiers, and gave them leave to better their own privatestate. The Privernats lay strongly encamped before their own City: and when he had assembled all his souldiers toge-D ther; " Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty, to you " will promife me to quit your felves like men, and to be as ready to fight as to spoil. Hereupon, with a great cry they call for the Signal of battel: and so advancing forward and exalting themselves bravely and couragiously, with assured hope of victory, to battel they go. There, even before the enfigns in the vanguard, Sextus Tullius, of whom we spake before, cryed out aloud, Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how thine army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn (word confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vanguard before the Standards, and at the first shock put the enemies to flight, followed the chair and drave them into the Town. And as they were fealing the Walls, the Town was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Pri-E vernats. By the other Conful there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Surrium, he proposed a law to pass by the Tribes, (a course never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentich part or vicetime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat / because by that Act there accrewed no small revenue to the Exchequer, that was now wasted) allowed thereof and gave their affent. But the Tribuns of the Com. moved not so much at the quality of the law in it self, as at the dangerous precedent given, ordained under pain of death, That no man ever after should in making of laws withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never so pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by fouldiers, that have fworn to their Confuls allegeance, and were at his devotion. The same year was C. Licinius Stelo at the suit of M. Popi-F lins Lenas, condemned upon his ownstatute in 10000 Asses, for that he together with his son, was possessed of a thousand acres of Land, and under colour of freeing his son, he had deluded the statute in that case provided.

and uncouth a shew troubled and disordered the Roman souldiers. And therewithal, at that ve-ched fearfully and flumbled upon the muritions and fortifications of their camp : But after, when as the Conful, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being scared like children with these vain bugbears: for shame suddenly they took heart again, and like blind men ran upon those very same things, that before they had fled from. And so after they had dispatched this vain device and preparation of their evenies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, discomfitted their whole army and put them to flight: and being the same day masters of their camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties and second time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtins was performed with case and facility, For having driven the enemies into the Town, he forraged their fields. But in the other war, the Falisci and the Tarquinians, discomfitted in the first battel the other Conful. Their greatest fear arole upon this occasion. fongs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their own fearfulnels. After H this, the whole nation of the Tuicans arole, having for their leaders the Tarquinians and the c Marting Ru. Falici, and came as lar as Saline. Against which fearind danger, was C. Marting Ruilling chosen, c manner to the first Dictator that ever was of the Commoners: who named for his General of the Horsemen a Commoner likewife C. Plantins. But the Senators thought this a finameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all they could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But so much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both fides of the Tyber (transporting his army in boats and planks fattned together) to what place soever he heard the ene- 1 mies were gone: and surprised many forragers of them, as they wandred and stragged one from another, in the fields. He set upon their campalso, and wan it: and after that he had saken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chased all the rest our of the Roman pale; he triumphed, by the fuffrages of the people only, without the approbation and affent of the Senators. And for almuch as they would not in any cale have an affembly for Election of Confuls, held either by the Dictator a Commoner, or by the Conful: and because the other Conful Fabins was busied abroad in the wars, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell again to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Mantius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Emplius, Q. Servelius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. During thesecond Interreign, there axose fome variance, for that both Confuls were Patritii, i. of the Nobles. And when the Tribuns interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alledged a Law out of the twelve tables in thele terms , That what foever the people ordained or granted laft, the fame Should be good, and fand firm and ratified : and in suffrages and voyces of the people, were comprifed their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribuns, for all their gainlaying and flepping between , could privail no more, but to prorogue the * Comices for the Election , there were at length two of the Nobles created Coniuls, C. Sulpitins Peticus the third time, and My alerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entred into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons loft the Confulfnip again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Confuls of the Patritii, upon the Interreign, began to govern , to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and I M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Empulum won from the Tyburtins, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Confuls there jointly together, the war was managed, as some have written; or that about the same time the Tarquinians Country was by the Conful Sulpitius over-run and wasted, whiles Valerius led forth a poweragainst the Tyburts. But more ado had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribuns. The Confuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in vertue and valour, that as they, being Patritii both of them, had received the Consulship, so they should make over the same again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if to be the Confulfhip should now become a Commoners dignity : or else to keep it wholly intheir possession, whereof they were first teized intirely, in right of their ancestours, On the other M fide, the Commons fumed and flormed in these and such like terms, "What should we live any "longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first gor by the vertue "and power of two only perions, L. Sextius, and C. Licinus, we cannot now all of us together "hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK. and Decemvirs again, or any o-"ther heavier and morefearful name of absolute and Lordy Empire, than to see both Consuls of "the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part fetled in " the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons, born for nothing else but to obey and "ferve. The Tribuns themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome mutinies, But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly feen above the rest in the action, And when as they were come down into Mars field fundry times N to affembly, but ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitial dayes of affembly were passed over, only in seditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the stiffness and oblinacy of the Consuls, took the matter to grievously to the heart, that when the Tribuns brake forth into thele speeches; "Now farewel freedom for ever: now are weldriven, "not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forlake the City, taken "captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles and therewith aldeparted the Commons "with forrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Confuls being thus left destitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Confuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambuffusthe third time, and T. Quintius, In some annals or yearly records, I find Coff. M. Popilius, in- 0 stead of T. Quintius,

In that year, were two wars performed with profesous fuccels. And the Tyburtins were fought withal until they yielded. From them was the City Saffet, won by force: and other Towns had tafted of the same fortune, but that the whole Nation hi I arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburius : otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquinians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them flain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, The seventh Book of T. Livius.

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common fort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum, were they all beaten with rods and beforeded. This execution made quittance with them, for sacrificing the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinians. This good fuccess in war caused the Samnits also to leek for peace and amity. Their Embaffadors were courteoully answered by the Senat, and fo upon covenants they were received into fociety. But the Commons sped not so well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Ufury was well eafed by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the B very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Com. in regard of their privat freights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Confuls of the Nobles nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs, Still the two Confulships remained among the Patritii. And created there were Confuls, C. Sulpitius

Petiens the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publical the lecond time

Now when as the City was eatherfly amused upon the Tuscan war, by reason that the news went, how that the people of Care, for very pity and compation, and in regard also of contanguinity, took part with the Tarquinians: behold the Embasiadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders; and would from them en-C ter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Confuls to cast lots for their several Provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuscan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpitius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinii, that the countrey was wasted and spoiled all about the Roman-Saline, for Salt-pits and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Carits: and that the youth of that people were doubtless employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Valerius the Conful, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Tusculum, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator. Who named T. Manlius, the fon of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Coffus for his General of D the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consular army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Carits, and sent them defiance. Then were the Cerits afraid of war indeed, and not afore, as though there had been more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and fignify war, than in their own deeds, who by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then faw they plainly that they were overmatched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made fuch wast and spoil, cursing the Tarquinians for folliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be ient, to crave pardon for their trespais and offence. When their Embassiadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they be ought the Gods, whose E facred Images they had received in the French war and devontly kept and cherished, That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress. And turning to the chappels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins, sometime their guests, whom they so chastly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wife. "Would The Embessare "any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be re- dors of Can, to "puted enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impute the people of " it rather to deliberat coun'el, than to some fit of heat and folly? And that we would blemish and Rome. "mar our owngood deferts, especially conserred and bestowed upon to thankful persons, with "new mildeeds and shrewd turns? and chuie to make the people of Rome their enemies now in F "their wealthy and flourishing State, and in their most happy felicity of war: whose friendship in "their adversity we had embraced? Beseeching them not to term that considerate advise, which "rather were to be called force and necessity, For the Tarquinians, say they, passing with a cruel and "puiffant army through our country & requesting nothing but away, had drawn with them some of our ruffical Peafants, to afful them only in fetching of that booty, which now so heavily is "laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yeelded, we are ready to deliver them: if "to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Care, the very "fanctuary of the people of Rome, the harbour and habitation of their Priests, the place of receit " for the Roman facred images and reliques, they would grant unto them fafe from the calamity of "war, and exempt from the flander thereof: and the rather for the professed vestal Virgins sake, G " fo kindly intertained, and for the love of the Gods, by them so devoutly honored. The people were moved, not fo much with the jultice and equity of the prefent caule, as for their old deferts and good turns to forget rather the harm fuffained than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned. & agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years (hould be registred among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falifci, who were tainted likewife with the same offence. But the enemies would no wherebe found, They wasted therfore al rest of the year was employed in repairing their wals & Towers; and the Temple of Apollo was de-

A Confuls no more force then it was in the chuling of the Cenfors. For Popilins Lenas was Con-ful, of the Commons, and L. Corneline Scipto of the Nobles. And the commoner Confull, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain. For when upon tidings brought, that a mighty army of the Ganls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gauls war was laid extraordinary upon dicated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons, H brake off the Election of the Confuls: whiles the Tribuns stifly denied to suffer any affembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Licinia. And the Dictator again was as floutly and ftifly bent, to abolifh wholly out of the City the Comulthip, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office and the matter grew to an Interreign. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously fet against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregent: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribuns they called on hard for the maintenance of the Law Licinia. The Commons, they had an inward grief that fluck neerer to them, upon the excellive ulury that Hill increased; and each mans privat care and grievance, brake 1 out in their publick contentions and debates. The LL, of the Senat weary of these troubles, commanded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unity fake, in the Election of Confuls to observe the Law Licinia. So P. Valerius Publicola, had joyned with him in fellowship of government, Caius Martius Rutilius, one of the Commons. Now whiles mens minds were enclined once to concord, the new Consuls labouring to ease also this matter of usury, the only spill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the general agreement; took order publickly for the payment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquevirs, whom of the despensing and disposing of the publick monies, they called Mensarii. And furely, for their equity and careful diligence, they deferred in all monuments and records to be remembred and renowned. And these they K were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius, Q. Publius, and T. Emplius; who underwent and managed this matter, so intricat and difficult to be dealt in : so grievous and combersome to both fides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with indifferent moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and defray of charge, rather than any loss and dammage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors flackness and negligence, than their want of ability, either the City out of the common flock croffed out of the book, by fetting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the publick Hall (provided, that there were good fecurity unto the City by furcties and cautions put in aforehand) or else the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty deal of L All debts clea. debts was fatisfied and paid.

After all this, a vain fear of the Tuscan war , upon a falle Alarm given, that their twelve Nations conspired and were consederate together, caused a Dictator to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coff, was the patent of the Senats decree fent, And to him was joyned as General of the Horsemen, L. Æmylins. But all was quiet without the City; Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Confuls should be created of the Patritu: which brought the government for the time to an Interreign. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpitius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain; namely, that both Confuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the of the twain that gave over the Interreign, and T. Quintus Panus. Some there be that give to forth to war; Quintus against the Falisci, and Sulpitius against the Tarquinians. Who, forthat they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingring continuance, as it were of a languishing con-Confuls, and by their permiffion after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the term of forty years. Thus the care was laid afide of the two wars, which feemed so neer at hand. And faid, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there should be held a general Seffing of the citizens. But, when there was an affembly summoned for the chusing of Centers, C. Martius Rutilius professing himself to stand for a Censorship, even he that had been the first about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unseasonable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, not propound his name at the Election. Howbeit, both he by earnel perseverance in his resolution chatorship, the Cenforship also should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. C.M. rins Ru. Navius, Martius should be created Censor. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any fear of war, but because the Law Licinia, for the choice of Consuls, should not be revived

Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received in the easement w and satisfying of their debts. So there were chosen C. Sulpitius Peticus, he, who was the former Quintius the addition of Cafe for his furname [and of Caius for his forename.] Both of them went fumption, the flubbornnes of both Nations was fo wel tamed, that they made petition first to the whiles there was some rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts above-N Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribuns with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was loft in the Election of the Confuls, fet to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majesty of the man himself, seemed worthy of the highest type of honor: 0 so the Commons were right willing that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Di-Neither in the affembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Manlins and observed. The General of the Horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the

Popilins, because Scipio lay grievously sick. Who having soon levied an army, and commanded all the younger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Questors should bring thither the Standards and ensignes out of the Aerarium | City chamber and after he had chosen out of them, fully four Legions, he delivered all the refidue of fouldiers unto P. Valerim Publicola, the Pretor : and moved the LL. of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readinets, against all uncertain occurrents of war, what need soever the City B should have, And now himself being at all points throughly furnished, setting forward to meet the the enemie. Whole power because he would know, before he had triall therof with the uttermolt hazard, he began to calt a trench and raile a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gauly camp, that he could come unto. The Gauls, a fierce kind of people and by nature cager of fight, having discovered afar of the Roman enfignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battel. But when they law the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palaiiado, and supposing them to be smitten with fear, and the fitter therefore to be affailed, for that they were at that instance busily occupied about their other fortifications; with an hideous noise and horrible shout, gave the charge upon them. The Romans gave over their work never the C fooner (they were the Triarii of the rereward that made thele fortifications) but the spearmen or iavelattiers of the vanguard, and the Principes of the middle ward, who flood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioners, made head and received them with fight. Befides their valour, the higher ground was their vantage : fo as all their darts and spears light not in vain (as commonly they do that are flung and lanced on levell ground) but stuck all fast as being poiled with their own weight: to that the Gam's being furcharged with darts either flicking through their bodies. or fall fet in their shields, and so weighing them down ; having also run themselves upon the hil; first, as donotfull what to do, made stay, afterwards, when progracting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and sell one upon another; and in that confusion made greater havock and worse, then the slaughter was by the enemy; and crush-D ed they were to death, more in that croud and thrult, then were flain by fword. Yet were not the Romans fare of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble behind. For the Gauls, by reason of their number, little feeling such a losse (as if a new army had started up in sight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh fouldiers and unfoiled, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and staied their esgernesse : both became they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflich ; and all for that the Conful, whiles he laid about him with the formost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well neer the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lingring, the victory had like to have been loft again , but that the Conful when his wounds were drefled and bound up, came back again E with speed to the formost ensigns, and faid : Why stand you still firstye have not to deal now, with M. Popilius the Latins or Sabins your enemics, whomaster ye haveconquered by the tword, ye may make of Lenas, the Conenemies friends and confederats: but upon very favage beafts we have drawn (word Either we his fouldiers must have their bloud, or they ours. From the campye have driven them back : chaled ye have them to fight, headlong down the hill fide cover the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye ftand : fill the plain "alfo with their dead carkales, asye have done the hils already; and never look that they will "flie, fo long as ye ftand ftill. You must advance your enfigns, and charge the enemy afreth. With these exhort ations they fell to it the second time, and forced the former rankes and files of the Gauls to lote ground and then with pointed close battailons of footmen, they brake through into the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the barbarous people being dilaraied, fuch as had F neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were feattered here and there about the plains, fled in this pursuit beyond their tents, and made toward the fort of Alba; which among many hils that stood of even height, they espied mounting above the rell. The Col. followed the chale no farther than their camp : both because his burt made himself unwieldie, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired army to a new labour, confidering the enemy had gained the hils tops, and to reited from farther purfait, And when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his fouldiers, he brought back to Rome his army with victory, and invicted with the spoils of the Gauls. The Cantal his wound staid h strumpt, which was a caute allo that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictatour, to hold the assembly for

He reflored again to the Senators their ancient possessing of the Confulfhip : and for this good turn, was himself with exceeding affection of them all, created Confull. And for his companion he choic unto him App. Claudine Craffies. But before the new Coniuss entred unto their office, Popiline with great love and favour of the Commons trinciphed over the Commoner. the law Licinia, had got for his reward a Confulfhip; which was more shamefull and infamous, in regard of his privat feeking for it, for being Dictator he had made himfelf Conful) hen for any publick harm and injury. This year for many and fundry troubles was very famous. The Gaulsfrom the Alban woods (for that they were not able then to endure the cold of winter) ranged all over the Champian and ica-coafts, and walted the country. The feas likewife were dangerous by reafon of the Greeks navy. Alfo all the tract along Antium, and the river of Laurentum, even to the very mouth of Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by fea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and ftrück once for all a dangerous battell and then departed afunder, the French unto their standing camp, the Greeks back unto their ships: both doubtfull, whether they had won or loft. Amid these treubles, the greatest fear by far, arose from this, that the I Latine Nation held certain Diets and Councels at the grove of Ferentina; and when the Romans demanded fouldiers from them, flat answer was made, That they must no more think to command "them whole aid they flood need of. And as for the Latins, they were resolved rather to bear " arms in defence of their own liberty, then fight for the maintenance of the dominions of stran-"gers. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for their two forrain wars, as also for the revolt of their confederats, feeling no other way, but to keep them in by fear, whom loialty would not restrain, commanded their Consuls in their mustring, to extend and strain to the utmost the whole strength of the State : for now that their Allies failed them, they were to trust upon their City forces onely. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country, as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men fay) were enrolled of fouldiers, amounting K to 4200. foot and 300. horse in a legion. Which puissant army, if now at this day any forrain wars were toward, these mighty forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not easily make again: fo great are we grown in wealth only and superfluous delights, to which we strive and apply our Among other heavy occurrents of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Confuls, in the very

preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved up on Camillus. To which fole Conful, either for his quality and worthineffe otherwife (not meet to be controlled by the absolut command of a Dictator) or for the lucky presage of his name so fortunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and I convenient that there should be a Dictatour adjoyned. The Consuls having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarius, bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gruls war himfelf, without calling lots therefore : commanding the Pretorto keep the fea-coafts, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the shore. He went himself down into the country of Pomprinum, and because he was not willing to give battell in the champian, unforced thereunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him thort, for forraging and fetching in booties, who of necessity was driven to live of prey, choic a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, X X Y as they passed the time quietly in their wards, as a settled Garrison : there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in perison tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious : who clattering his shield and fpear together, and thereby making filence, gave defiance and chillenged by his interpreter M the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Colonell of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himfelf nothing lefs worthy of that honour than T. Manlaus, having first known the Contul his pleasure, advanced himself forth spart from the rest, armed at all points. But this conflict (as touching the prowels of themen) was less notable than the other, by reason that the hand of God came between & took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyn and cope, behold fuddenly a raven fetled upon the creft his of morion, even ful in the face of his enemie. Which at the very first, the Colonell took joy fully as a token of good luck sent from heaven. Afterwards he praied devoutly, that the God or goddesse whosever, that sent unto him from above that augurall foul, to preisge and forefignifie the future event, would be favourable and gratious N unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be fpoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon, but allo, as often as the champions buckled and closed together, mounting up with the wings made at the cies and the face of the enemie, with beak and claws both, to long untill laterius killeth him. For the Gayl being affrighted at this fo strange & wondrous a fight, both his eies dazeled, and his mind was mightily troubled. Then the raven took his tite, flew on high quite out of fight towards the East, All the while the camp on both fides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonel began to rifle and difarme the Body of the flain enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans contein, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And so about the bodie of the Gaul that lay slong dead, began fome skirmilh, and thereof grew a fharp and cruell battel: for now not only the companies o of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both fides, came abroad and fought. Camillus commanded the fouldiers, joyous for the victory of the Colonell, joyous alfo for the gods, to favourable and ready to belp, for to go to battell : and the wing very often unto them the Colonell, fet out bravely and enriched with the spoiles of his enemie, " Follow this brave gentleman, good fouldiers (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the "Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the help of God and manevidently : and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtfull conflict : both

A armies had to conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind, the future event of thefe two fouldiers that had fought together. Between the formost, whose concurse had raised others, there was a fharp conflict : but the reft of the multitude, turned back before they came to the solley of dares. And first they were scartered along the Volician and Falern countries: but after-Ward they took their waies toward Applie and the lower Adrietick fea.

The Conful having aftembled the fouldiers to an audience, folemaly before them all, commended the Colonell, and rewarded him with ten oxen and a coroner of gold. Himfelf, by direction from the Senar, to attend the war by fea, joyned camp with the Preter. And there, because through the cowardile of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long B and lingring, he nominated, by the authority of the Senat, T. Manlim Torquain for the Dictatour, to hold the Election of Confuls. The Dictatour having named for his Generall of horimen, A. Cornelius Coffus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declated for Conful one like himfelf, and tracing the steps of his own vertue and glory, M Valering Corvimm (for that was his furname afterwards) in his ablence : a young man, I fay, three and twenty years old To Corvinni Was adjoyned companion in government a Commoner, M. Foptims Lenge the fourth time. Camillar performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks: for neither were the Greeks good touldiers on land, nor the Romansat fea. At the last being kept from landing; and failing, befides other necessaries, of fresh water, they left lady. Of what people, or of what nation in Greece this fleet confifted, is not certainly known. I would think verly, that they were the Ty-Crants or potentats of Sicily, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time weated and toiled out with civill wars, much feared the greatnesse of the Macedonians. After the armies were dicharged, and that both acroad there was peace, as also at home quietnesse, through the unity of the States seed they should be glutted with too much joy, behold a pellilence arole in the Cty and constrained the Senar to command the Decemvirs, to overlook the books of Sibylla: and by direction thereof, was a Lettifferne celebrated. The fame year there was a Colony drawn out of the Antiats, to people Satrician, and the town was repaired for them, which the Latins had defiroied. Also there was at R. me aleague concluded with the Carthaginian Embassadours, who came of purpote to tue for fociety and amity. The same refl continued fill both at home and a-D broad, when T. Manlisse Torquains, and C. Plantine the second time were Confuls. The nury which was before after one in the hundred, became now but half to much. The paiment of debts was dispensed & ordered into three years by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat had more regard to fee credit kept with the chamber of the City, then of the difficulties of privat persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbare to collect the tribute and to

The third year after that Satricum was reedified by the Volicians, M. Valerius Corvinus the fecond time Conful with C. Petilini, upon news of Latinus, that Embessadors from Antinus went about to the nations of the Latins, folliciting them to rife up in arms, was commanded to make war upon the Volicians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put himfelf on the journey with a fierce at my toward Satricum. Whither when as the Antiats and other Volfcians were come to meet him, with a power provided aforehand, against any preparations from Rome, prefently without any thay they joyned battel, as being through a deep fetled and long batted, malitionfly bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more haity to rebell, than hardy to fight, being defeated in a battel, fled amain and highed apace to put themleves within the wals of Saricum. But when the wals were not able to fave them, for that the town being environed and invested round with souldiers, was ready to be taken by scaling, there were upon 4000 of them, besides the common fort not meet for service, that yeelded themselves. The town was rased down and burnt; only they spared the firing of Matutas church. And the whole saccage and spoil was bestowed upon the fouldiers. But there were not comprised within this booty, the 4000 that r yeelded. Those the Consul in his triumph caused to be led bound before his chariot : and after that fold them, & brought a round fum of money into the treatury. Some write, that this number of captives, werebondflaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be fold, who yeelded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fabius Dorsuo, and Servius Sulpitius Camerihus. Then began the Aurunean war upon a fudden invalion that they made. And for fear left the action of that one State and City, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictator (as if it had been against all Latium already up in arms) L. Faring Camillus: who chose for his General of horimen, Cn, Manling Capuelinus. And (as the tile had been in time of great troubles and fudden tumpilts) he mustered without any respect of surmunity and Exemption, and therewith proclamed a Ceffation of all courts of law and the legions with all speed possible were led against the Auruncans, where they found, that they carried the mind G of plundeters rather then of warriors. So that in the first battel, that war was dispatched, Howebelt the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and warred first, but also offered fight without any drawing back, supposing there were some need of Gods help withall from heaven, had yowed a temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for, and therby was charged to perform his vow, fo foon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictatorship. The temple of The Senat commanded two officers called Dunmvirs to be created for the edifying of that temple, Juno Montal. according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and fer out on the [Capitoli] hill, even the very plot of ground, where sometime before stood the dwelling house of H M. Mastin Caputalium. The Coll.having imploied the Dictatour his army in the Volleian war, Surprised at unwares the rown Sora out of the enemies hands. The Temple of Moneta was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Martins Rutilins the third time, and T. Manilins Torquars: the fecond time, were Confuls. Immediatly upon the dedication of that church, there enfued a strange wonder, like unto that old marvel of the hil Albanus; For it rained stones, and in the day time it fermed to be dark night. And the books of Sibylla being peruled (for that the City now was mightily given to superflition) the Senat ordeined, that there should be a Dictator named for the ordering of certain feaths and holy daies So T. Valerius Publicela was chosen, and with him, Q. Pabim Ambufin: Generall of the horimen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes should I go in folemn procession with their praiers and Letanies, but also the nations that bordered upon them; with a precise direction unto them, upon what daies every one shall make supplication. That year (as it is reported) there passed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people against the Viurers, with whom the Ædiles had commenced fuit. And without any notable cause to be remembered, they grew to an Interreign. Upon which, that fomething might be thought thereby done, both Confuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerine Corvinne the third time, and A. Corneline Coffee.

The Embaffsthe Senat at

Now from bence forth will we treat of greater wars, both for the puissance of the enemies, and allo for their far diftance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long track of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms against the Samnits, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both fides with alea- K native fortune, there succeeded Pyrrbut their enemy, and after Pyrrbut the Carthaginians. To see (good Lord) the wonderfull live and troubles, and how often the Romans fell into extremities of perils, that their Dominion and Empire might arise unto this greatness and high state, which hash much ado to hold its own, and ftand maintained But the cause of the Romans war with the Sam- Afrace and sits, being in fociety and amity linked together, arofe, first from others, and not upon any quarrel the Duchie of between themselves. At what time as the Samplita warred to to the control of the control the * Sidicins : they as the weaker and forced to file for fuccour unto the richer, banded with the Campains. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid and affift their Allies, & flowing in riot and superfluous delights, hapned in the country of the Sidicins to be foiled &cdefeated by the other, who had been inured and hardened by continual use of arms and to after I wife called Ty wards drew upon their own heads, the whole violence and poile of the wars. For the Samnits anumor Thra- letting the Sidicins alone, went to the head, and let upon the Campains, as it were the very fortreffe and caftle of defence for al the borderers. For wel they wift that there they might win victory as easily : but riches & honour at their hands they were to atchieve much more. And when they had gained and held with a ftrong garrifon, the hils called * Tifata, that were adjoyning, and commanded the City Capua, From thence they descended with a four square ranged battell into the plain that lyeth between Capua and Tifasa: where a (econd field was fought: In which the Campanies had the overthrow, and were beaten within their wals. Having therfore no hope neer hand, and feeing the strength of their youth greatly decased, they were constrained to feek for aid of the Romans. Whose Embassadors being admitted into the Senat, and having audience given M them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect." The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them, spake much what to this effect. "The people of Lapua, most noble Senators, bath fent usin them." " amity if we had requested in our prosperity, well might it sooner have begun, but knit had it been with a weaker bond and not fo durable. For then, remembring our felves to have entred league and fociety on even ground, and in equal eftate with you; friends haply we should have been as we now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in cale by your " commiseration and pity we be gained and won; and in our distresse, by your aid, helped and relieved; we mult needs affectionarly embrace a benefit from you received, unlesse we would be "thought untbanktull wretches, and unworthy of any helpeither of God or man. And albeit the " Samnits, have been before us intertained in friendship and confederacy, yet we think that no N " (ufficient bar, but that we may also be received into the same. Only thus much it ought to make " for them, as to be preferred before us in antiquity of time, and degree of honour. For in that alliance between you and the Saninits, there is no expresse clause, no caveator proviso contained, " against the making of any new confederacie. And furely, alwaies heretofore ye have thought "it cautegood enough of your friendship, if the party who fought the same, were but willing "and delirous to be your friend. We Campains (albeit our preient condition suffereth us not of to speak magnifically) giving place to no nation but your selves, either for the stately port of our City, or goodnetie, and fruitfulneffe, of our foil, in entring into your acquaintance, fall "not a little, I uppose increase and better your good estate. And first for the Equians and . Volicians, thole eternall and perpetua l enemies of this City, they shall not so soon at any time 0 " fir and put out their heads, but we will be streight upon their jacks. And look what ye first " fhall find in your hearts to doe for our tafty, the same will we alwaies do for your Empire and honour. And when those nations be oncesubdued that are between you and us (which your "vertue and fortungt felicity, promiteth will be (hortly) then shall your dominions reach all the es way in a continued train, as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable cafe it is, that our prefent for-Grande ungethus to coefelle; To this exigent and hard terms of extremity are we Campains dri-Grane urgeth us to correcte; To this exigent and nate to our friends or to our enemies. If you (right honorests of that lubject we mult be, either to our friends or to our enemies. defend defend us, yours will we be ; forfake us once, we must be the Samnits. Confult ye now therefore deliberatly, whether ye had rather, that Capua and all the territoric of Capua, should be annexed "unto your power and State, of added to the Samnits Seignory, your mercy your fuccour, O Nothe Romans, ought in equity to extend unto all men, but especially unto those, who by yeelding "their relief and helping hand (even above their power) unto others, that inplored and humbly "belonght fuccour, are now themselves fallen all, into the same streights of necessity. And yet, to fay the truth, we fought in shew and semblance of word for the Sidicine; but in very deed "and effect for own felves. For considering a neighbour nation, bordering even upon us, to be "robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnits; we well foresaw, that when the Sidicing B " were once fet a burning, the same fire would soon be driven and reach unto us. For now are not " the Samnits come to affail us, as discontented for any injury received : but, as well pleased that as they have cause of quarrell offered and presented unto them. For if it had been but a revenge only of anger upon some pretended wrong, and not a mean and occasion, to satisfic their greedy appetite : had it not been enough for them, that they had vanquished and put to the fword our "Legions once in the Sidicine country, and a fecond time in Campain it telf our own territory? " what a cankered and a mortall malice is this, which bloodined and maisacres in two battels can "not fatiate or afswage? befides the wasting of our fields, the driving away of booties, as well of "people as cattell, the firing of villages, the ruin and bavock they made; and in every place nothing but fire and (word, Could not their anger and wrath have been fatisfied with all this? But it C a is their greedy and unfatiable covetoniness and nothing elic that must be filled. That is it which a carrieth them, that haleth and draggeth them to the absult of Capna. At it their teeth water, that " most goodly and beautifull City will they either destroy, or be LL, thereof themselves. But may it please you Romans, to gain it afore by your own benefit and good desert: rather then suffer st them to feiz upon it, by wrong and mischief. I speak not this before a people that useth to make " it strange and goodly to undertake any rightful and just wars. If ye but shew a copy of your conn-"tenance, as if ye would aid and fuccour us, I suppose ye shall have no need at all of further war. The Sammits overweening of themselves and contempt of others, reacheth tous only, "further it proceedeth not. So that under the very shaddow of your affiftance, O Romans, we "may be fately covered and protected. And whatfoever we shall hereafter gain thereby, what-D " may be tarcity cover on support the support of «all yours. For your take shall the Campain ground be tilled : for your behoof shall the City Ca-"pms be reforted unto and frequented : and accounted shall ye be of us, no less than founders, parents, yea, and as the immortall gods. There shall be a borrough or Colony of yours, that "shall go beyond us in obsequious dutifulness towards you. Do but afford unto us Campains, O "Noble Senators, a token of your gracious countenance, yeeld us your invincible name as a e powerfull deity, and bid us hope affuredly, that Capua (hall remaine still and continue in fafesety. What a number think ye of all forts and degrees of people, followed and accompanied erus, when we came from thence ? How left we all places filled with their vows, their praiers "and tears ? In what expectation now, do the Senat and of people Capua, our wives and childen, attend our return ? Affured I am, that the whole multitude stand about the gates looking E a toward the high port-way that leadeth from hence thinber, waiting to know what news, ex-" pecking what answer, my LL your pleasure is that we should report back from you unto them, " to carefull, to heavy, to perplexed. One word presenteth unto them safety, victory, life and et liberty etheother, I dread to presage what it may import. Wherefore to conclude, determine of de us, either as of them that shall and will be, your confederates and faithfull Allies; or elle such ce as must be worse then nothing. After that the Embassadors were withdrawn aside, and the Senat fell to counfell a although a good part of them were of opinion, that the greatest and wealthiest City of all Italy, the most plenteous country and near to the fea, might be as it were the garner and storehouse, whatsoever variable changes of corn and victuals might happen: yet they set p more by keeping their faith and promise, then of that great commodity that might accrew unto them , and thus by direction of the Senat made the Conful answer. "The Senat judgeth you O The answer of Campairs worthy of aid but meet it is that we entertain your amity, fo, as a more ancient for the Conful to ciety and friendship be not thereby violat and broken. The Samnits arain league, and confede- the Embassa. "rat with us. We must needs therefore debar you from making that war against the Samnits, dorr, which should fooner dishonour the godsthen burt and wrong men. Howbeit, as equity and treation doth require, we will to our Allies and friends send our Embassadours, to intreat them to 4 offer no violence unto you. To this aniwer the chief man of the Embassage (according as he had commission from home) replied and said. "For as much as ye are not willing to defend our right. "and cause, by just and lawfull power against violence and injury; your own yet, I am fore ye « will maintain. Therefore my LL of the Senat, here we yeeld up in your hands, and to the The Citizene, G Seignory of the people of Reme, the whole nation of the Cartung, the City Capna, our lands and of capus furen Seignory, of the people of Rome, the whole nation of the Caruins, the City Capna, our lands and der orthe Ropolle flions, the lacred temples of the gods, and all things elle both holy and profane. And whattoever from fiencesforth we shall suffer and abide, we will sustain as it your stegement and subjects, by and territor wholly devoted as vasfals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the Con- 17. fuls, shed tears plenteously, and fell down upon their snees in the very entry of the Connecll house. The Senat moved with consideration of the changeable course and turn of human forbetraied, those that thus were reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Samnium could in any equity or colour of Justice, invade that land, or affault that City, which was inrendred and annexed to the imperial State of Rome. Whereupon prefently they agreed to dispatch Embaffadors unto the Samnits, who had incharge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campains petitions: fecondly, of the answer of the Senat returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Samuits amity: laft of all, of the I Campains furrender. Then to requelt and defire them in regard of their mutual fociety and friendfhip, to spare and sorbear those, that were their vasials, and not with any hostility to invade that territory, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could do no good, then, to command the Samnits in the name of the people and Senat of Rome, to abitain from the City Capua and the country of the Campains When these Embassadours debated these matters in the Councel House of the Samnits, they returned so front and arrogant an answer again, not in these terms only, That they would go forward in the war began; but (that which more was) the rulers coming forth of their Councell House, even whiles the Embaffadors there flood, called to the captains of the cohorts, and with a loud voice commanded them forthwith to make a rode into the Campain country, for to spoil and ferch boories. This Em- K baffage being returned home again to Rome, the Senators fetting alide the care of all other matters, fent their heralds to demand restitution : and for default therof, after the foleum maner to proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with all ipeed poffiole to propound this matter to the prople : and by the confent of the people, both Coff, with two armies departed the City, Valerim into Campania, Corneline into Samnium: and pitched their tents, Palorine at the foot of the hil Ganrue, and the other at Satricula. The Samnit legious presented themselves first to Valerius (for that way they supposed all the forces would be bent) for indignation also, against the Campains, because they were to ready one while with their own fuccours, & another while in fending for the aid of others against them. And to soon as they discovered the Romans camp, in all hast (every one for his part) called luftily to their captains for to ftrike up and found the battell a affuring themselves, and L laying plainly, that the Romans should speed as well in succouring the Campains, as the Campains had done before them in aiding the Sidicins. Valerim, after he had amufed the enemies not many daies together, with fome light skirmifnes, only to make triall of them what they could do, at the General bis paviput forth the * fignall of battell at the lait, but first exhorted his fouldiers in a short speech in this wife," That neither this new warnor new enemy should terrific them: for as much as the far-The exhorts "ther they warred from the City the more cowardly Nations they were and leffe warlike still to tion of Paterius whom they went. That they should not esteem the valour of the Samuitsby the late losses & dethe feats of the Sidicins or Campains. For wholoever they be that contend & fight together, one fide orother cannot chuse, but go to the wals. The Campains, doubtlesse, had the overthrow raet ther through their own effeminat tendernesse, as slowing too much in excelle and superfluity of M " pleasures, than by their enemies hardinesse and valour. And what were two only fortunat batetcls of the Samnits, in fo many ages to be tet against fo many honourable victories of the people "of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their City, may number more Triumphs well neer et than years : who have by war fuodued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hetraria, the Latins, Hernicks, & quians, Volicians, and Auruncans. And as they ought to go into the field, every " man prefuming & trulling upon his own manhood and glorious warfaretto fhould they have an eye, and confider, under whole leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether "he were a man that in the hearing of his fouldiers, could only make goodly and magnificall Ora-"tions, fierce in brave words, void of Military works : or he who himfelt knew how to handle " his weapon, to advance before the standards, yea, and to be emploied even in the midle of all N " the battell. I would have you (quoth he) my fouldiers, to follow my deeds and not my words, 4 and of me to learn, not only discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and factions, noryet by courting and Oracions (attuall matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand if of mine, attained unto three Confulthips, and to the highest honour. The time had been indeed, i when a man might have taid thus unto me : No marvell, For why? You were a gentleman of noble blood, descended from those that were the deliverers of their country : & in the same year that the City had first a Conful, this house of yours had the Confulfhip, But now the case is alter-6. ed, theway unto a Confullhip, is as open to you Commoners, as to us of the Nobility. Now is it "not the guerdon of birth and gentry, as aforetime : but the reward and recompense of venue " and valcur. And therefore my fouldiers, shoot at the highest dignities, and aim at foveraiga of thonour. And although ye that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given "unto me this new addition of furname [Cervinu] vet have not I forgot the actient neare of the es publicolat, appropriat unto our family. I love and ever will (as alwaies 1 have done) the Comor mons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in wars, and alio at home in peace, as well a privat person, as in my ortices, were they little, or were they much: whiles I was I ribune, whiles I was " Conful; and no changling have I bee throughout all my Confulfhips, one after another. Now for et this present enterprisewhich we are about, with the help of God, & in his name, have a case with

A " me for a new and fresh Triumph over the Samnits. Never was there a Generall more familiar with his fouldiers : as willing as the meanest of them, to lay his hand upon any base of fices that The familiarithat were to be done; yes, and in the very training and exercises of the souldiers, at what time ty of covering as equals try masteries of activity and strength, one with another, gently would be otherwhiles with his foultake the foil, as well as the victory, and ever keep one countenance fill; not rejecting or refining other good any one wholoever would offer to match him, or be his mate. For deed, benigne and bounteous to his power, and as occasion required : in his words, no lesse mindfull of the freedom of others, than respective of his own place and dignity and (than which, there is nothing more popular look by what vertuous demeanour & carriage of himfelf, he fought to attain unto honours and B promotions, with the same he bare them, and went through with them. Therefore the whole army with incredible cheerfulnesse accepting this exhortation of their captain, iffued forth of the camp into the field. Never was there battell fought more indifferently on both fides. Their hope was like, their forces equall, with full trust and confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Samnits, for to whet their courage, prefumed upon their fresh and late atchieved acts, and their double victory but few dates before. The Romans on the contrary fide. ftood upon their honour and reputation for the space of four hundred years, and their conquests every fince the foundation of their City. Yet they were troubled, both the one and the other, to deal with a new and unknown enemy. The manner of their fight shewed what stomacks they carried. For the conflict was such, as for a good while they seemed on neither part to yeeld one foot.

C Then the Conful, feeing they could not by mere force be caused to retreat, thought to fet a sudden A cruell bard fear among them : and therefore affaieth, by lending in the horfmen upon the formost enfigues, tell between to break their rancks, and put them in difarray. But when he faw, that in fo fmall room of and Samnira ground they toiled themselves in vain, and could not well manage their troops and cornets, nor break in upon the enemies, he rode back again to the van and, forefront of the Legions, and difmounted from horsback," Wethat are footmen (quoth he) when all is done, must do the deed Hee well. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which way foever I go) by dint of fword to make way and entrance into the enemies battell: fo every man for himfelf, down with him that of that is next in his way. Straightwaies shall ye see, that where as now their spears and pikes " fland glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their flain carcafes. He D had not fo foon spoken these words, but the horsmen at the Consuls commandment, ran upon both the wings and points, and made way for the footmen to, enter the main battell. First and formost the Consul in person chargeth the enemy, and whomsoever he hapned to encounter, him he killeth in the place. This goodly fight fet the reft on fire a and then every man did his beft, laid about him manfully, and carried it afore him right worthily. The Samnits stood to it still and moved not, about they got more knocks and wounds then they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithfranding much bloody flaughter about the Samnits enfigues a yet no flying was there on any fide : fo refolut were they, by death only to be vanquished. Whereupon the

Romans feeling their own strength for wearinessed edecaied and spent, and but little day left, inflamed with anger, gave a fresh charge all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) began they to shrink and give ground, and encline to flight : Then were the Samnits taken prisoners E and flain thick. Few or none had escaped alive, but that the night came so fast upon them, that it interrupted the victory, rather then ended the battell. Both the Romans themselves confessed. they never fought with a more stubborn and obstinate enemy, and the Samnits also being demanded the primitive cause, which forced them (to stifly bent as they were) to tun away at the last, faid, that the Romans seemed to have burning fire in their eies, and to carry in their faces and visages the furious rage of mad and frantick persons : and thereat first began they to be affrighted, more then at any thing elfe. Which fearfulnesse of theirs, they be wraied not only by the present event of the battell, but also by their dislodging and departure away in the night. The morrowafter the Romans were mafters of their empty and naked camp, unto which all the whole multitude of the Campaines came running in number to rejoice and congratulate their victo-

But this joy had like to have been fouly blemished with an overthrow and defeat in Samnium. For Cornelius the Conful being departed from Satricula, had engaged his army unadvifedly within a forest, through which went an hollow valley or lawn, fortaid on both sides with an ambush : neither discovered he his enemies over his head, before such time as he could not retire with his enfignes into a place of rafe receit. But whiles the Samnits staied only untill he had brought his army fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decins, a Coloneli of footmen, espied in the forrest one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies lay encamped : and as it was for an army heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up unro : io for them. that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiving the Contul troubled C in mind and affrighted: See you not (quoth he) O Anius Cornelius youder hill top above the enemie? That is the very fortreffe of our hope and fafety, if so be that we can gaine the tame luftily, as the Samnits have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the Principes Iby, as the Samnits have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the Principes Ibe policy and spear men of one only Legion. And when with them I have once seized the top thereof, set and valour of forward you from hence and fear not, neither make doubt to fave your felt and the army. For the P. Deinis enemie being under us, and lying open to all our shot, cannot stir without great losse and present wichief. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our own manhood thall work our evasion. Being commended by the Conful, and having received that troop and guard which H he demanded, he marcheth close through the woody pais, and was not deferied by the enemie before he approached the place that he went to get. And whiles they all were smaled thereat and wondred, and wholly turned their eies to him ward, he both gained the Conful fome time to withdraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and possessed himself of the hill top, and there refted. The Samnits, whiles they turn their enlignes to and fro, (as men that loft the vantage of both fides) could neither make after the Conful, but through the same valley, wherein a while before they had him under their shot, nor yet erect their squadrons, and marchup that hill, which Decim overthem had already gained, But being more angry with those, that thus had disappointed them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and confidering withall the nectnelle of the place, and their (mall number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keep Decius from the Conful; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might fet upon them. Thus whiles they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them. Decime at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up against the hill : but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither beganto charge upon him, nor yet when they were disappointed and put by that purpole, through disadvantage of the ground, fortified themfelves with trench and rampier, and other pioners work. Then calling the Centurions unto him " what unskilfulnefle (quoth he)of military fervice, what fupine flackneffe and floth is this? and "how got these lozels the victory of the Sidicins and Campains? Ye see their ensigns waving bither g st and thither; one while hudled they are in one together, another while advanced and diffiliated at " length. As for munitions & fortifications, no man beginneth any: and by this time we might have "been entrenched round about. But it we fray herelonger then for our vantage, we might be " counted lazy lubbers like them. Come on then, go with me, that whiles day light terveth, we may " fee in what places they quarter their guards, and what way we may get from hence and escape. All this went he to espre and discover himself in person clad in a common souldiers jacker, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their fouldiers ; to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the Generall himself, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had disposed the tentinels and corps de guard, to all the rest he commanded a watchword to be given, that when the trumpet founded the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and make no noise at all. When they were thither assembled with silence, as be had commanded, a This stilnesse my fellow touldiers (quoth he) must ye keep whiles ye hear me speak, and for bear all giving aftent by uttering your voices (as fouldiers ule to do) When I shall have delivered my mind to you, let as many as like thereof, go footly on the right hand, and not speak a word: and look what if die is greater, that course shall stand and take place. And now listen what my conceitis, and what I would have done. The enemy hath not invelted you here, as men either fled away for " fear, or lagging behind for floth and idlenesse. The place have ye won by manhood : by man-44 hood must ye from thence escape. In coming hither, ye have already faved a brave army of the es people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, save your own selves. Worthy you are "that being but a few, have fuccoured many, ye should not stand in need your selves of any n " mans help. With that enemy ye have to deal, who yesterday through their fentelesse sloth, overfifipped their happy opportunity to defeat our whole army; who were so blind, that they faw " not this hillot logreat importance even over their heads, before it was by us gained : who being 66 fo many thoulands, could neither debarus from climbing up, as few as we were, nor when we "had got the place, compasse us about with a trench, having to much day as they had. These ene-" mics, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whiles they were awake, and had their cie-light, " ye are to deceive when they are fait affeep, nay, you must doe to indeed, there is no other reme-"dy. For at that paffe we are now, that I am rather to fhew you, in what terms of extremity ye "frand, then to advise you to the execution of any good counsell. It is no consulting at this time whether ye should here stay, or depart hence; sith that besides your weapons, and hearts setting h "up relt upon their weapons, fortune hath left you nothing at all. And die we must without " doubt for hunger and thirlt, if we dread the fwords point more than befitteth hardy men, and st valorous Romans. One way there is therefore, and but one way of fafety, even to make a brave "fally through and away. This must we do, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soon cleared. If we look for the morrow day, what hope have we, but that the enemy will caft a "dirch and bank even round about us : who already as ye fee lying under this little rifing, have compassed it with their very bodies. Now, if so be that the night be a convenient and favourable "time for irruptions and fallies, as in truth it is : then, this hour of the night certainly, is of all osther the fittest. At the second watches sound ye are come hither, at which time all men are in their most found and dead sleep. Amid their bodies being fast asleep, shall ye go. Either by fi- o si lence decrive them unawares, or if they perceive you, affright them with a judden outery. Do es but follow me, as ye have done already, I will follow the same fortune that guided me hither. "Now as many of you that think this good counfel, and a confelike to speed well, make no more se adobut pals on my right hand. So they all palsed, and followed after Decins as he went through the quarters void of watchmen and warders. Now were they escaped the mids of the camp, when a fouldier, as he clambered over the watchmens bodies, lying heavy afleep, chanced to flumble at a shield, which gave a found again. Wherat the watchman being awakened, raised his next fellow; and they being i ftart up, call up other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the garison of Decise on the hill was broken forth, or the Conful had surprised the camp. Decime then, feeing his fouldiers could not paffe clear and undeferied, commanded them to fet up a thout. And therewith he smaled them with a new fright, who were already drowned in drowfinels; fo as they could neither take we apons readily, nor make heed against them, nor yet purious after them. Whiles the Samnits were thus amazed and in confusion, the Roman garison had by this time flain the warders whom they met, & were marching towards the Contol his camp, as yet was somewhat of the night to come : but now they seemed to be safe, and past all danger. Then Quoth Decim on forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans; This your passage and ren turn to and fro, all ages shall extoll and praise. But for the full fight and view of io great valour. we had need of broad day light; for ye deferve better, than that the ftil night should hide you in so eglorious a return of yours into the camp. Let us here reft, and wait for day, His words were o. beied; and to foon as the day brake, he dispatched a medenger afore unto the Conful; and so with exceeding joy they made speed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the privy watchmen, that they who had put their lives in most dangerous hazard for the safety of them all, were themselves returned fate then every one came forth to meet them as falt as they could, with prailes and commendations, calling them both all & fome, their faviours, prailing the immortall gods, and giving thanks, yea, and extolling Decise to the skie. This was the triumphof Decise in the camp, as he marcheth through the midit thereof with his armed garrison, whiles every man C cast his cies upon him, and made him a Coronell, equalt to the Conful in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Pretorium, the Conful by found of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entred into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decius, Decius himself interrupteth him, and cutteth of his speech. Whereupon the Confol put off the Oration. Decision then periwadeth the Conful, to fet afide all other things, and whiles the occasion and opportsnity was offred, he urged him effectually, to give an al'arm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this feare by night, and also lay scattering about the hill, as it were in their feverall feonces. Besides, he thought verily that some were sent out after him to make stress suit, and wandred aftray in the forrest. So the Legions were commanded to arm, and being departed out of the camp, and by means of the espials better acquainted with the forest, they were conducted by Da wider and more open way toward the enemy, whom fuddenly they furprised & charged unawares and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnit fouldiers were stragling abroad, and most unarmed, and could neither rally themselves and take arms, nor retire into their trench. they drave them at first with fear into their camp-after, whiles the guards about it were difordered and troubled, they were malters thereof also. The noise was heard all about the hill, and capsed every man to flie out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heeles before the enemy could come. But so many as for fear were driven within the trench (& those were some 30000) were all flain: and the camp rifled & spoiled. The Conful having atchieved this exploit, called an assembly, and not only finished the praises of Decims, as he before began, but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new fervice. And befides other military gifts, he rewarded him with a crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one speciall white one, fat and fair above the relt with guil-E ed horns. The fouldiers who together with him held the hill aforfaid, had given unto them for ever after, a double proportion of corn, and for the prefent one oxe a piece, and two fingle liveries. After the Conful his reward was beltowed, the Legionary fouldiers themselves put upon Decing The fouldiers his head a wreath of green graffe, in token of a delivery from fiege, and with notable thous and also recom loud cries approved this gift. Another chaplet or garland, also, in token of like honour, did his pensed. own band and company let upon him. And thus being adorned with these ornaments of honour. he facrificed that cholen white one unto Mars; and beltowed his hundred oxen among those his Agarland calfouldiers, who had accompanyed highin that appoint and fervice. To the same fouldiers the legi-led Objidonalis ons gave a pound measure of wheat meal, as a sextar of wine, a piece. All these particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulness, and accounted with shouting and acciamation of Sexuarius the fouldiers, to fignific their good liking and generall affent.

A third battel was fought at Sueffula: wherin by M. Valerine, was put to flight the holt of the our wine mea-Samnits. Whereupon, the whole manhood and flower of their youth that remained at home were fent for and affembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. Fearfull news hereof came from Sueffulato Capua: and from thence carriers and posts were dispatched to Valerise the Conful, for aid. Forthwith he advanced the standards, and leaving the carriages belonging to the camp, with a strong guard, he marched forward in great hast: and not far from the enemie, took alittle plot of ground to encamp in ; as having befides their horfes of fervice, no beafts at all for cariage, nor a rabble of flaves and variets that follow the camp. The Samnits (as if without further delay they were to fight) embattelled themselves. But seeing none to encoun-G ter them, they came with banner displaied to the very camp of the enemies. And there so soon as they beheld the fouldiers upon the rampier, and understood by them that were fent out of purpose to view the circuit of the camp, in how imal compaffe they had fortified, gueffing therby how few their enemies were; there ran a noise throughout the army, to make no more adoc but to fill up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and so presently to break into the camp. And cven in that ra unesse had the war been decided and dispatched, but that the captaines held in the violence of the fouldiers. But for as much as their own number to great, required good ftore of victuals, and was both by their lying before Sueffula, and also by their long stay there without H fight brought to fearcity well-neer of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kept within their hold as affrighted, the fouldiers (hould be fent about the country a foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more corn with them then they could carry on their shoulders, befides their armour. The Conful having espied the enemies ftragling over the country, and their guards stenderly manned, after a brief exhottation to his fouldiers, led them forth to give an affault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onset, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier; he caused the enfignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place and leaving there two legions, I for a guard and defence, with a straight charge, that until he came again, they should forbear to rifle and make spoil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the horsmen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the feattred Samnits, as it were, within net and toil, he fell A notable deupon them and committed an exceeding great flaughter. For frighted as they were, they knew neither at what fignall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or flie further away. But logreat was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Conful. 40000 fhields, more indeed then there were men flain : besides 170 en. figns, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies tents, and bellowed the whole pillage there, upon the louldiers. And such was the happy successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat, for a league a and also K turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Peligoi. Neither refled the fame of this fo fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embafiadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing * twenty five pounds, to be set up to Jupiters Temple within the Capitoll. Both Confuls triumphed over the Samnits : and Decime followed after, all goodly to be feen, with his gifts and worthy praifes : whiles the fouldiers, as their manner was, with merry jefts and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell no less than the Confuls.

After this the Embassadours of the Campains and the Suessians had a day of audience : and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrisonto winter L there, for to ftop the excursions and invasions of the Samnits. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the fouldiers there : who having once got a talte, and taken a delight in a world of pleatures of all forts, quite forgot their own naturall country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devite how to get Capua from the Campains even by the same wicked practile, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessors "and inhabitants, faying, " It made no matter, and they were but rightly ferved, incafe their own " precedent lewd example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains, "not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be LL. of the most plentiful "country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent thereunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their (weat and blood had repeiled and expelled the Samnita from them? And was it any reason, that they who had yeelded to be vestals unto them, should enjoy that fruitfull of and pleasant traft, while they them elves wearied with fighting, ftruggled fill and wreftled in a es pestilent air, and dry barren toil, about the City of Rome, and within that City, indured the set-" led, inveterat and inteltin milichief & plague of ulury, that furcharged them daily more and more? Whiles these projected confpiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, thenew Conful, C. Martius Rutilius came in place : whose lot it was to be L. Deputy of the province Campania, Laving his fellow Q. Servilim in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those defignes: being a wife man, both for his old age and age experience (as who was now Conful the fourth time, and withal had been Cenfor and Dict for) thought it belt to diffemble the matter, and N to make void and fruitrat the pretent heat and outrage of the fouldiers, by deferring and prolonging their hope, as it they might put in execution their plots at their best leifure, whenfoever they pleafed. He raifeth therefore a rumour, that the garrifons should in the same towns winter againthe year following. For divided they were into fundry Cities of Campania: & the web begun at Capua, was fored from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respit to bethink themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Confuls then led forth the fouldiers into the fummer places of abode and repose, and purpose while he had the Samnits in quietness to cleanse the army by the casheiring &discharging those busie bodies and troublefome spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served already to long as the law required others were well now stept in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decaied. Sonie had their paiports limited, and were fent home : at the first one by one fingled out, afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of military fervices and imploiments, whiles to me were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Conful and the Pretor kept ftill at Rome , deviting this cause, and that, of delaies and abiding behind. And verily at hift, they being not aware of this delution, were not unwilling to vifit home. But after that they perceived, that

A neither they who were dismissed first, returned again unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged elfe, but fuch as had lien in winter garrifon at Capua; and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy; first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their complots were revealed and come to light, and that now prefently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed iccrerly apart one by one, and fuffer the infolent lordlinette, and cruell tyranny of Confuls and Senatours over them. These and such like speeches sow they and whisper secretly, hat were in the camp, when they saw the principall authors of the mutiny, who were the finews and ftrength thereof, by the wily policy of the Conful to be difmenbered from them. One cohort of them, being not far from daxor (at Amutiny and them down of Lantula, in a narrow passe or wood between the sea and the mountains, to inter- fedition of the them down of Lanting, the nation pane of wood between the real and the mountains, to inter-cept and flay, whomsoever the Conin sent about this or that presented businesse as above; aid. diets of Cam-Soon were there gathered together a right strong power: and nothing wanted to make schew passage of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of long Albathey encamp themselves within a trench and rampier. Which work being finished, they spend the rest of the day in confultation about chusing a Commander, little trulling any one there prefent in place. And who possibly (fay they) could be fent for as far as from Rome ? What Senator or Commoner was there, that either wittingly would venture upon to great and dangerous an enterprise : or to whom the cause of an army, enraged upon an injury received, might safely be committed? The next morrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and fadly debated the matter, some of the wandring and vagrant forragers of the Country thereabout, bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quinting imploied himself in husbandry, and held a farme in Tufculanum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of state and Common weal. This man was come of noble linage, and having ferved with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a legand gave over fouldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, sequestred far from all courting and ambitious fuing for civil offices. They had not to foon heard his name, but prefently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing : they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they that were sent thereto, entred the sam house, and finding Quintim found and t fast assep, they T. Quintim swakened him : propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else pre ent death : and no surprised by mean between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them : and so they haled and brought the rebels and him to their camp. Incontinently he was faluted L. Generall at his first coming. And when the leader against man was affrighted at this fudden and wonderful occurrent, they endue him with the Ornaments his will, and enfigns to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advise or counsell of their captain, they march in warlike maner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the causey or street way, now called Appia Via : and had approached immediatly in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, and a Dictatour created to withstand them, to wit M. Valerius Cervinus, together with L. Emylins Mamerons General of horimen. So Soonas they were come in enterview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and enfigns : the remembrance of their native country wrought with them ftraightwaies a mitigation of their mood, They were not yet fo far gone, nor to hardy, as to shed civil blood:neither had they knowledge of any other wars but forrein and the uttermost rage and maddest fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Secession and departure away from their own countrymen. And therfore both captains and souldiers on either fide fought means to meet together, and draw to imparle. Quinting for his part, who had ving had already his handsfull of wars in defence of his country, could worse brook taking arms against the same : Corvince likewise for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the fouldiers especially, and above all others those of his own army that fought r under his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as foon as he was once known, he had no leffereverence done of unto him of the adverse part, than filence and audience given of his own men. The immortall gods (quoth he) O fouldiers as well thole which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worthipped in this wife, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchfafe me the honour, not of a victory over you, but of procuring concord and unity among you. Occasions there have been, and will be enow else where, to win glory and warlike renown . From The Oration se hence, peace onely is to be fought. And even that which among my vowes that I made of Valirius Corthe longist to devoutly of the immortall gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. Ask and have, any reasonable and indifferent conditions : although in truth we were better to yeeld unto hard and unequal capitulations, "than wickedly and ungodly, one to fight with another. T. Quintins with teares guth-I ing out at his eies, turning to his owne companies: "And even me also (quoth he) "O fouldiers (it need there be at all of mee) yee have a much better captaine for peace than " warre. As for him who even now uttered those words in your hearing, was neither "Volseian nor Samnit, but a Romane, even your owne Consull sometime, souldiers, and "your own Generall herecofore : whole Auspicate conduct, you having tried for you, "and in your defence ; doe not prove now against your selves to your perdition. Others " had the Senate to fend as captaines, who would have fought more maliciously with you: but "they have made choice of him who above all others, could beare with you, yes, and forbear you that have been his fouldiers: whom you of all others especially might truft, as haer ing been your Generall. Peace, yee fee, even they defire that are to get the victory. M "And what is it then we ought and should defire? Why then fer we not anger and " hope aside, two false motives, two deceisful guides and counsellers; and betake er our felves and all wee have to a man of approved trust and fidelity? These words being "liked well of all (as appeared by a Generall shout) T. Quintins went forth before the enfignes in the forfront, and pronounced that the fouldiers should be at the Dictatour his devotion and pleasure: beleeching him to consider and undertake the cause of poor and wretched citizens a and baving taken it into his hands, to maintaine and protect the fame, according to that faithfulnesse wherewith hee used to governe the Commonwease. As for "bimfelfe privately, he would not intend ought for his owne fecurity: neither repoled "he hope in any things else but innocency. The fouldiers indeed were to be capitulate, as N once heretotore the Commons, and a fecond time the legions had done with the * Senateurs : namely, that this their revolt and pety rebellion might not be laid un-"to their charge, and their hurts and utter undoing. Then the Dictatour, after hee had first commended Quinting, and willed theirest to be content and of good cheer, rode post to the City, and by the advice of the Senatours, preferred a bill unto the people in the grove Petelinus : That the mutiny and insurrection should turn no manto fear and danger. He besought the Quirites alio of this much favour besides, That noither in jest nor earnest, this should be laid in no mans dish. The same time there was proposed besides. a facred military law under pain of death, That no fouldiers name once surred into the mustermasser bis booke, should be rased out against his will: With 0 this branch accessed over and besides, That no man who had been aforetime a colonell of Tribune, should after have the leading of bands, and be a Corporall. This was solonelly of the dead of the sure of t lowed hard and urged by those of the conspiracy, in regard of one P. Salonins, who in maner

each other year had been either a Colonel, or a chief * Centurion, whom now they call Prisopili. Him the fouldiers spighted much, and were maliciously set against, because he had alwaies

A posed himself against their conspiracies and innovations, and took not part with them who fled from Lantula. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the favour they bare to Salonius: then Salonius himself belought the Senators that they would not regard his honour more than the concord of the whole City: and so at length it also was granted and enacted, As unreasonable a demand was this also, That of bor sment per, (and that was triple at that time) some Asserting be deducted, for that they also had with stood the confirmer. Over and besides, I find in some writers, that L. Genutius, a Tribune of the Commons, published this Law unto the people, That Usury might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewise in other Acts of the Commons it Was provided, That no man within ten years space sould be copyble of the same Office twice: nor in B one year bear two Offices: and that both Consults might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Commons, it appeareth that this infu rection carried some sway and force with it. In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Valerius was chosen Dictator, but that all this bufine's was by the Comuls managed: nor so great a multitude of Conspirators rose, before they came to Rome, but e en in Rome took arms: nor yet that they came by night, in for cible manner into I. Quintius farm-house, but in the dwelling house of C. Manlius: and that he was taken up by the repels to be their General and from then e went as far as four miles end, and there encamped in a forrified place: that the motion of Concord arose not from the Captains, but that of a fudden when both Armie stood aranged in order of battel they fell to greeting one another; and that the ion diers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with tears: and that the Confuls feeing the fouldiers to backwark from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an attonement. So as among an ient writers, there is no certainty let down but that a ledition there was, and the same appealed. But the rumor thereof and the cruel war which the Samnits begun withdrew certain nations from the Romans for iety and alliance. For besides the faithless and untrusty League (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernats also with sudden rodes, invaded and wasted Norbaand Setta two Colonies of the Romans near bordering and adjoyning,

The Latines, together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having fent their Embassadors to the Senat (of Rome) offered and presented peace, upon this condition only, that they would create r one of their Confuls out of them. This Embassis thus declared, Annius their Pretor, who had audience in the Capitoll in going down from thence, took, uch a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caused his ownson to lose his head, because, contrary to his express command:ment, he had fought against the Latines notwithstanding his good successint hat combate. At what time as the Romans were greatly difressed, and like to lose the field, P. Decius then Coss, with Manlius devoted and offered himself to pre-Sent death, for to save the Army: and setting spurs to his horse, rode into the midst of the enemies battell: where he was flain and by his death recovered victory to the Romans. The Latines yielded and rendred themselves. When T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him and do him honour Minutia, a profess d Vest all Virgin, was condemned for her sincess, or in-continent life. The Ansonians being subdused, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another list, wife in P Fregellæ. Many Roman dames were detetted of prattifing poylon: and most of them were firced to drink of their own empoysoned cup first, whereof they ded presently. Whereupon was the first Law then ordatned against porsoning. The Proper nets, when they rebelled were conquessed and afterwards end redwith the Burgessi: of the City of Rome, The Palapolitans were deseated in battell sirly, and sters is ge-surrea-dred upon Composition. Quintius Publishus, who blocked them within their wals, was the sirly man that had his Comm flon renued, and continued fill in government, when the ordinary time was expired; and by mean of the Confuls had atriumph grant duto him. The common people were delivered from the danger of their creditors, by accasing of the filth lust of one of them, Lu Papirius, who would have forced and against nature at used C. Publius, a dibter of his. When L. Papirius the Distator was returned from his Army into the City for to take the Auspices anem, by reason of some errour supposed in the for-G mer, Q. Fabius the Generall of the horsemen having in his absence espicet the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit gave battell contrary to his Edict and put the Samn testo the worfe. For w ich ca fewhen the Dict stor would fe m to panish him accordingly Fabius made an esc up and fled to Rome. And when his ca f. would not bear him out he had is pordon at the earnest sute and prayers of the people. This book containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Sammites.

Ow was C. Plautius Conful the second time, with L. Emylius Mamercus, when as the Setines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernats revolt, with complaints of harms sustained at their hands. News came likewise, that an Army of Volscians, under the conduct of the Antiats, were encamped at Satricum. Both these wars fell by lot to Planeins. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith bad them battel: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and restored again to I the Privernats, with aftrong garrison therein placed, but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Sarricum against the Antiats. Where was a cruel battel fought with much bloudshed on both sides : and when as the tempestuous and stormy weather parced them afunder, before that either fide enclined to victory, the Romans no whit wearied with that conflict fo doubtful, addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volscians having taken a view and account what men they had lost in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again : and therefore as vanquished men they dislodged by night in disorder, and fearfully took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great flore of armour was therefound, both upon and among the flain bodies of the enemies, and also within the Camp: Which the Con-K ful promifed to dedicate to dame Lua, and to he forraged and spoiled the confines of the enemies, even as far as the fea coaft. But against the other Conful Emplius, who was entred into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnits encamped, nor their Legions opposed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and sword he wasted their Countrey, the Samnits Embassadours came unto him, craving peace: but being by him posted off to the Senate, after they had andience given, they let fall their flour flomacks, and requested peace for themselves with the Romans, and liberty to make war against the Sidicins: which petition they enforced with more reason and equity. "First, in that they had entred into amity with the people of Rome, during their prospe-"rity, and not as the Campains in their advertity: again, they were to take arms against the Si-"dicines, enemies alwaics to themselves, and never freinds to the people of Rome: who also, L "neither in peace (as the Samnits) fued for friendship and alliance, nor in time of war (as the "Campains) fought for aid and fuccour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the " people of Rome, nor yet their vaffals and fub jects. When as T. Emylius the Prætor had confulted with the Senate, about these points demanded by the Samnits, and that the LL, thought good that the league with them should be renewed; the Prator in the name of the rest, made answer to the Samnits, " That neither the fault was in the people of Rome, that the confederacy between "them was not perpetual; neither gainfaied they, but for a smuch as they were weary themselves "first, and repented of the war commenced through their own default, the league might yet be "newly made again. Touching the Sidicins, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnite "people, might uie their liberty and do what they thought beft, either for war or peace. The M League being thus concluded and confirmed and they returned home, presently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receit of a years pay, and cornfor three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Conful, in confideration of a truce granted, untill their Embaffadors were returned.

The Samnits, with the same forces which they had employed to withstand the Roman war, went forth against the Sidicins with undoubted hope, speedily to win the City of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicines before made an offer to yield themselves unto the Romans, but seeing the Nobles to reject them as coming too late, and wrested as it were perforce from them in their last extremity, they tendred the same to the Latines, who were already of their own accord risen up and had taken arms. The Campains likewile (to ready and forward were they to bear in mind N an injury of the Sampits, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbare not to joyn in this quarrel. Thus was there raifed a mighty power of fo many Nations banded together, under the conduct of the Latines, and invaded the borders of the Samnits, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmifnes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding to many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Sampits leiture to fend Emballadors to Rome, who before the Senat complaining, that they enduredthe same measure still, being now associats, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: besought most humbly, "that the Romans would be satisfied with that victory of the "Campains and Sidicins, their enemies, which they had got out of the Samnits hands, and not "fuffer them to be trodden under foot by those Nations, the most dastards and cowards of all 0 cothers: requelling moreover, if so be the Latines and Campains were under the dominion of the people of Rome that they would command them by vertue of their authority to forbear the 6. Samnits country: and if they refused to obey then to chastise and keep them in by force of war. To these demands they framed a doubtful answer, as being loath and abashed of the one side to consels, that the Latines were not at their devotion, and fearing again on the other side by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and lose them for ever. And this was the anfwer, "As touching the Campains, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and con"ditions in forme of League, but by voluntary and fimple fubmission under their protection; and "therefore they should be quiet whether they would or no : but as for the Latines, by any capi-"tulation comprised in their accord, they were not prohibited to levy war with whom they lift, Which answer, as it sent the Samnits away, in doubt what to think what the Romans would do; to it estranged and alienated the Campains for fear: and made the Latines more stout, as supposing the Romans now would give them the head & yield any thing unto them, And therefore under a colour of preparing war against the Samnics, they iummoned and held many Councils one after another: and in all their meetings and confultations, their Princes and chief men fecretly amongst themselves did nothing but plot and practice war with the Romans In which conspiracy also the B Campains had their hand as deep as the rest, even to bear arms against those who had been their Protectors. But although they did what they could to keep all cloic of purpole, and were deficons before the Romans should stir, to be secured from the Samnits. (an enemy pressing hard upon their backs) yet nevertheless this complot was discovered, and intelligence thereof given at Rome, by means of certain persons linked to the Romans in privat acquaintance and mutuall hospitality. Hereupon were the Confuls commanded to refign their Magistracy before the ordinary time that fo much the sooner there might be new created against so great a danger and preparation of war. But here role a scruple of conscience, that the affembly for Election should be holden by them, whole government was thus shortned and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Interreign, And two Interregents there were one after another, M, Valerius and M. Fabius: who crea-

C ted Confuls, T. Manlins Torquains the third time, and P. Decius Mus. In that year, it is recorded for certain, that Alexander King of Epirus, arrived in Italy with a Navy: who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romans. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who Alexander the being this man his fifters son, and a warrior invincible, whiles heatchieved feats of arms in ano. Great. ther part of the world, hapned to die in his best time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward. The Romans although there was no doubt but that their associats, and namely, the Latines were revolted : yet, as though they were carefully busied about the Samnits only, and nothing intended them; they lent for to Rome ten of their chief Peers, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Prætors or Provosts, L. D Annius of * Seria, and L. Numitius of Circeia, both Roman Colonies. By whole means, befides Sig- * Stage. nia and Velitre, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volscians were follicited likewise to take arms, And thought good it was, that those Latine Prators by name, should be cited with the rest. No man was ignorant for what intent they were sent for The Prators therefore, called a Council before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what answer to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, the should be chatged. When some were of this opinion, some of that; then Annius spake and said: The speech of "Although I my self have moved you to resolve upon an answer, yet I think, it concerneth us more Annies in "in our main effate, to determine what to do, than what to fay. And when we are grown to a re"folution once of our affairs, and what course to take, an easie matter will it be to frame words fit time." E" for the purpose, For if even now already under a shadow and pretence of an indifferent league,

"we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what standeth in the way, but that ha"ving abandoned and betraied the Sidicioes, webe obedient not only to the Romans commande ment, but also to the Samnits? and answer the Romans in these plainterms, That at their beck "only, and if they do but nod their head, we will presently lay down all arms? But if at length, the "defire and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there " be a league between us : and if consederacy ought to be nothing else but a society and equal stui-"tion of liberty and priviledges : if, I fay, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof fometimes we were ashamed that we are of kin to the Romans, and of their bloud : if they have an Atmy of as-"fociats, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces; and which the Confuls in leaving or F "levying their proper wars, will not part and sever from their own: why is there not equality in " all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and foreces, there also is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in it self is not a matter of so "great honour unto us, as who have granted and confessed Rime to be the head of Latium: yet by "long patience and continual sufferance only, we have brought to pass that it might seem honou-" rable. But if ever ye wished to see the day wherein yemight participate in government and re-"cover your liberties again, lo, that time is now come presented unto you by your own valour, and

G "up, and given us not one foul word. We warred upon the Pelignians in our own name and quar-"rel:and they, who aforetimes allowed not us the liberty fo much as to defend our own mar-"ches of our felves, nothing gainfaid and croffed it. That the Sidicins were taken to our mercy and "protection, that the Campains revolted from them and fided with us, that we levied an army against the Samnits their confederats, they heard and knew well enough and yet they stirred not "once forth of their City, How come they to be so calm and quiet, but upon a privity and know-"ledge, both of our pulfance and of their own weakness? I am able to avouch by the report of "men of good credit, that when the Samnits complained themselves of us, they had such an an-

"twer again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to H "require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay coclaim unto that which they fecretly yield unto you themselves, and reposses it at your pleasure. " Now if any man beaffraid to be the speaker, Lo, here am I, who profess to be the man, and to "fay thus mu.h. not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter him-"felt, who is reliant in the Capitol namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and con-"federacy, they shall admit from amongus one of the Consuls, yea, and a part of the Senat. As he with great ipirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promifed also thus to do; all that were prefers with a general applause and aftent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought prefers with a general applause and aftent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they re-I posed in him. So so no as he was come to Rome (with other Embashadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manliss the Conful, by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the reft, not to make war upon the Samnits their confederats: Annins raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embaffador, who was to deliver his mind and meffage lafely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this fort: "The time required (quoth he) now at length, OT, Marlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by "way of authority and commandment, namely, when you faw Latium by the favour of the gods "to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnits, confederate "with the Sidicins and Campains, and now also combined with the Volscians : and besides, even K "your own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines "rather than the Romans, But foralmuch as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see "how to make an end of your proud and outragious Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we are ableto reftore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred fake wil be content to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased " the immortal gods, that we are equal unto you in power and puissance. Imprimis, there is no re-" medy now, but your two Confuls, must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine : Item, that the " number of Senators be elected as well out of the one nation as the other, I:em, that we become "one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one im-"perial feat, and one name of all, and therefore we or you must needs yield, we are content a Gods L "name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this City and State of yours be coune red the better and more noble : and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it fo fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlins to match him ; one as stout and hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly faid, "That if the Sena-"tors were fo far overfeen and befides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would o T. Manlius. come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine soever he saw there in countil, he would not fail but flay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning control of Impirer: Heatken (quoth he]O good god Jupiter, Heat this wickedness and including the large of Jupiter; in this thy how dignity: heat O Julice; and piety to Godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter; in this thy how "Iy and facted temple wilt thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot to fee Confuls of M " aliens & a Senst offorceiners? Are these the covenants; O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome "made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinius after him, concluded with you? "Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye fo forgotten indeed, both your "own calamities and overthrows of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our "hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded chat when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated their names oftentimes. Annius in mockery of those protestations, was over-heard to despise and from the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger Repped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the Rairs, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottom stair, that he swooned with all, and lay for dead, But N becanse all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also wil leave it doubtful. as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there poured down a tempessuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps, For, as these and such like things may be very true to they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew the wrath and vengeance of God, Torquatus being fent by the Senat to give the Embaffadors their dispatch seeing Annius there to lie along, tried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the people and faid. "No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and bless, O ye immortal gods our just and rightful war Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity gods, our just and rightin was one of the same of the " rites ye likewise my I.L. of the Senat to take arms in the name of the gods having them already as you're to be your Leaders? I for my part thall foon to overthrow and lay the Legions of the

"Latines along on the earth as ye now see their Embassador, lying here at the stairs foot. The words of the Conful received with to great applaule of the people, animated and enkindled them ment of the Conful accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary safe conduct

The Oration of Amus in the Sanat of The eighth Book of T. Livius.

The Senat also gave their affent to this war, and the Consuis having levied two armies, and paffed through the country of the Marhans and Pelignians, and joyned unto them the Sampits power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their affociats, were already come together. There as the report goeth, the Confuls both of them in their fleep had a vijion: and there appeared unto them, one and the same shape of a mans personage, much greater and more flately than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver these words unto them, "That " of the two armies embattelied and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tri-"bute to the infernal spirits, and to Mother Earth : and of the other, the chief General only, And "look of whether army the faid foveraign General should devote and offer unto those internal B "fittits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own perion withall, that part "and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appeale Gods anger) that certain facrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inwards, as appeared in their fleep, then one or other of the Confuls should fulfil the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsaiers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entred and letled already in their minds, then the Confuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the peasure of the gods, to the end, that the wilful and voluntary death of one of the Confuls, might not fright his army in the field. they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallons began first to give back C and retreat the Conful of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, suting altogether to them in language, fashions, armour, and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warrare. For, many a time, in these two armies souldier with souldier, Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel, had forted and conversed together, as collegues and compeers in the same garrisons, yea, and under the same colours and ensigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no errour the souldiers should be mistaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no n man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It fortuned now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent out every way as scouts and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlins the Consul his son together with the rest of his Cornet and Troup, was passed above the enemies Camp, so near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard. In which was quartered the cavalry of Tusculum, under the leading of Geminius Metius a Knight, both for birth, and alio for his noble feats of arms highly effectmed in his country. He espying the Roman horse, and knowing the Cost, son, advancing before them, and of especiall mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another.) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight with the Latines and their confederats? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do E the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himielf, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Jupiter I say who only cando more than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus, have given you fighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves to, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminius, riding forth as he was on horseback, alittle from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean with so great a do to set forward your armies to a general set field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpass the Roman? The young man his bloud and courage was foon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God F would to have it, and it was his deftiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers commandment, and the express Edict of the Consuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a fingle fight: wherein it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worfe, for any great odds thereby in the maintrial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both pares were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tilt: in the void place of the plain field that lay between, they rantheir horses in full carreer one against the other, with that pand deadly spear in reft. Markins with his lance aloft gid over and raited the Morionot his enemy and Merins with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck, Then having turned about their horses, Mantius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the snatt of which wound the G horie reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider, And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous sal, Manlins ran him through at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs, and nailed himfast to the ground. And having disarmed & desposed him rode back to his own troop; and both together with exceeding joy hastned to the Camp, and so to the Generals Pavilion, evento his father; full little knowing his fatalldelliny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deferved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be perswaded and report truly that I am descended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubted ion Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here thet spoils of him slain and dead. Which so soon as the Cos, heard, presently he could not abide to look on his fon, but turned away, and by found of trumpet, commanded the hoft to a publike audience, Which being affembled in great number. "Forasmuch (quoth he) as then, T. Manling, with-" out regard of Coff, authority, or dread of thy fathers majefty and power over thee, gainft our E-"dict and express commandment, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and "place; and as much as lay in thee, hast broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State " of Rome hath flood maintained, and haft brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must "forget either the Common-weal, or else mine ownselfand mine, we will abide rather the pu-"nithment and imart for our own middeeds, than the whole state, to her so great prejudice and da- I "mage.fhould pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: "but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily, both the inbred love and " affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew and proof of thy valour and knight-"hood (although feduced with deceitful apparance and vain refemblance of honour) moveth me not a little: but fince that, either by thy death the Coff, commands must be established, or by "impunity of thy disobedience for ever disanulled, I would not wish thee to refuse (if there be any " of my bloud in thee) but by thy punishment to restore and set up again the military discipline " which this day by thy default is faln down and ruinate. Go fer jeant, and bind him to a stake, At this fo cruel a fentence, they were all amazed and in an extafe, that were prefent : and as if they had seen the edge bent against themselves, for sear more than for any modelty or reverence, they K were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their ipints had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had assonied themselvey shood still with slence-but fo foon as the poor wretch his head was chopt off, and his bloud feen to gush and spin out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbare neither lamentations nor curies: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, fet it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and so with as great love and affection as souldiers could shew, performed their last duty unto him, and tolemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manliss were not only dreadful for the prefent, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future to all foveraign Commanders of an Army. How bein the rigour of this punishment made the I fouldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the fet corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the very hazard and extremity also of the battel afterward, that austere severity did much good. For their fight was much like unto a civill war. So little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Roman long large shields, covering their whole bodies; but in process of time, after that they became Stipendaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets, And whereas aforetime they had their battallons thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanges, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more loofely and diffincily, and laft of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: every such order or squadron M contained threekore fouldiers, two Centurions, and one Port enlign. The forefront of the vangard ware javelineers called Hastai, in fifteen squadrons, distant some little way one from another: fuch a fquadron had twenty fouldiers lightly armed, and all the rest a fort of Targeteers, And those were called light-armed who carried only a spear or javelin to sight with at hand, and ther darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-fervice. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes; whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrons, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battallon of thirty companies, they called Antepilan [avant-darters] for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard before the enfigns, And of these, every band confisted of three parts: and each of them N they called Primum plum, and it was composed of three banners or pannonces : and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannonce or banner conducted the Triarii, who were old fouldiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorarii, of less puissance both for age and prowers: the third such as were named Accens, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battallon. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into these bands & iquadrons, the javelineers formost of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and foft pace retired backinto the void places between the squadrons of the Principer, who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the battel and to maintain fight, and were seconded by the Haflati or Javelineers. The Triarii remained flanding all this whiles firmly, about their enfigns, fetting 0 our their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their floulders, and their pikes of javelins flicking on the ground, with their heads somewhat hending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Pallisado or rampier of pales and sharp stakes. Now if those Principes had not good fuccess in fight, they retired themselves by little and little from the forefront to the Triari. And hereupon grew the proverb that when a thing was at a dead lift and in diffress they would say. We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hastai, into the void place between their files, presently drew in their

A ranks and files close together, and that up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battallon (as if now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battel of fresh men starting up, and the same increased in number.

Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, confifting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battalions after the tame manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only enfign with enfign, R all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one Centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter, Two Primipili or chief Centurions, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman, of body not so strong and well fet, howbeit a good fouldier otherwise, skilfull and of great experience : the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were one unto the other. because at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Col. to chuse unto him an under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him tale from an enemy that should hap to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought. not far from the foot of the hill Vefavius, in the very way that leadeth to Veferis. The Roman Consuls before they came into the field killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the borsel-prying Soothsaier (as it is reported) shewed to Decime the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded. (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Mailim he had as good figus of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is wellyer (quoth Decius) if my collegue speed well, and have good success by his facrifice. Their battels being to arranged, as I faid before, they marched into the field. Manlius led the right wing, Decius the leit. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and hear of stomack. But afterwards on the left wing, the Roman Haffati, not able to fulfain the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes, In which trouble and featful diforder, Decias the Cof, called aloud to M. Valerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius. Where art thou, the publike "high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and say afore me that form of words, whereby I may "devote and betakemy self for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Pratexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the faid tobe at his chin and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow: [O Janus, Jupiter, father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, Oye Lares and domesticall gods, the gods Novenfiles and Indigetes; ye gods likewifes whofe power extendeth over us and our enemies and O Manes the infernal gods, you I invocate, you I worship and adore, your pardon I beseech and favour crave, that ye would prosper all power and voltory unto the people of Rome and Quirites; and put to fear fright, and death, the enemies of the people of Rome and Quirites, And just as I pronounce inset E words so for the weal publike of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I betake with me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my felf after them. Having made this praier, he willed the Serjeants or Lictors to go to Marlins, and with all speed to tell him, that his collegue was devoted for the army. Himself girded after the Gabine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was feen to carry with him much more stately and venerable portthan a man, as fent from heaven to be a fatisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turn away all plague and mischief from his own people upon the enemies. All terrour and fear he carried with him as he went, and first disordered the entigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battallons, and afterwards entred within into the whole army. This was noted and feen most evidently, that F which way so ere he rode the enemies were smitten with sear, as if they had been blasted and struck. with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was faln and overcharged with shot of darts, presently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all ques-filon) as am zed men, sled away and avoided. And therewith all likewise the Romans, as if they had been discharged and freed from their religious sear and struple of constiente, and as if they had but then and not before heard the sound of the trumper to battel, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rorarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Anteplani, and therby re-enforced the Hastai and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Col.gave them sometoken to arise. Asterwards in process of fight, when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, Manlius the Conful, ha-G ving heard of the final end of his companion and (and right as piety would) accompanied as well with plaints and tears as with due praises so worthy and memorable a death for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to arile. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be referred in heart and fresh, into the last push of extremity, he biddeth the Accent from the hind-most tail of the rereward to come forth before the standards. Who so loon as they were come in place, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like raised their Triarii. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and we ried themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by meer force repulled their enemies; thinking now all had been done and the victory atchieved as being come as far as to the utmost skirts or the battallous; "Then, if "quoth the Conful to the Triarii, rife now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful " of your country parents, wives and children, mindful of the Conful, who for your rectory bath "taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfoiled, were not fo foon rifen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict. For they receiving the Antepilani between their files, fet up a shout and outery troubled & disordered the Principia of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, flew the principal flower and ftrength of their best & formost men and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been difarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and close battallons, with fo great amurder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies I alive. The Samnits also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battel array, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that fervice rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himself alone; the other in that battel shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posserity, that of whether army T. Manlius had the conduct, that way doubtiess would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minturna i their camp presently upon the battel was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decini be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of K flain energys, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins : and with all honour and solemnity according to his death performed by his brother Conful were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Consul, Dictator, and Pretor, whenloever they sacrificed and be now to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and ofter withall, not themselves in a took to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and ofter withall, not themselves in a took to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and ofter withall, not themselves in any case but any Citizen whom they would; provided alwaies that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans, I and if the man who is thus addited and destined to death, hap to destall is well, and at it ought to be: But if he dien it then was the image of him seven foot high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propriseory sacrifice via stain in his sead: but where so we have sure it and tansfull for any Roman Magistrate to set for and come. But if It a man would need ofter and vow himself to death, as Decius shid, and die not, he shall not purely perform a min served duty, or do sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hat honce thus brinken himself. If he will be equent him of the sure around to Vulcan, or to some saint whomselve the slift be it primited and lawfulf or himself of the sure around to which the Consult shanding on both his feet, made his proper, and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to seize thereon: but if her fortune to win the same, a proper, it and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to seize thereon: but if her fortune to win the same, a properitator sparsite amile be offered to appeals Marsso with spine, a spirely and a Bell.] And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customes and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of the and are membrane, by reason that we prefer new and forrein ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of out own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amis to make report hereof, even in those yet Morting and humans customes and an acce words and terms as they were used delivered and pronounced. In some writers I find, that the Samnits having waited to see the event of this battel, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past, Also, that there was succour a coming from Lawinium unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow; by reason that they ipent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the formost enigns and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and flaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is faid, That their Prætor or Provolt, named Millionius, ipake these words, "That io small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and full sweetly would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battel. and were scattered afunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded N themselves for safety in the City Vescia. Where in their Councils and assemblies, Numisius their Generall, averred, and affored them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (faith he) The two royal pavilions of their Cof. are polluted and defiled; the one with the parricide of his own ion, the other for the death of the Cof, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain : their Tavelineers and principals killed: a bloudy flaughter committed both before and behind the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last upshot renewed the fight and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated yet for a fresh supply, either Latin O mmor Volfei are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they fo thought good, he would with all speed raise the lusty flower and chosen manhood both our of the Latines and the Volicians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing lets, than a fecond battel. So by dispatching his cautelous and deceitful letters into all parts of Latium and the Volician nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was atumultuary army in great half levied, enrolled, and affembled together out of all quarters.

A This hoft as it marched, Torquatus the Conful met at Tifanum, a place between Simus fa and Min-turna. And before they could chuse out a plot of ground to encamp in they bestowed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either fide: fell to a battel prefently and made a final end and conclufion of all the war. For the enemies were brought so low that as the Consul led his victorious Army to walte their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him : and this their rendring the Campains likewise followed. Thus Latium and Capus forfeited and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernats laid thereto, and the Territory of Falcrii, which belonged to the people of Capua, even as far as the river Vulturinus, was divided amongst the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplement of three tour parts out of R the Privernats land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Falerin, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, because it was so fer off, were affigned for a man. The Laurentins only, of all Latium, and the horsemen of the Compains escaped this punishment and were exempted from the rest because they had not revolted. And a decree passed, that the League with the Laurents should be renewed; and from that time usually every year is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidaies. Those Campain horimen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they fer up and fallned a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Caffor, The people of Capus were enjoyed to pay yearly to every one of them, (and they were a thousand and its hundred in all) 45. Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment inflicted according to each mans defert, T. Marlius returned home : whom the elders only [for certain] went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhorred, and with curses detested him. The Antiats made certain rodes into the Territories of Hostia, Ardea, and Solona, And for that Minlim the Conful was not able himself in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of fickness, he nominated for Dictator L. Papirius Crassus, who as it hapned was at that time Prator: by whom was named for General of the horiemen L. Papirius Gurfor. This Dictator, albeit he kept the field, and lay encamped certain months within the Confines, yet archieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of io many and to puissant nations, and withall, for the noble and samous death of the one Conful, and for the government of the other, albeit ftern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; n there fucceeded Confuls, T. Emylins Mamercus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affairs: and they themselves were more mindul either of their own private business, and studious to maintain a side and faction in the Common-weal, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they discomfited in the plain of Fenetta, drave them both out of their Cimp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publilius (by whose governance and conduct that victory was archieved) received furrender of the Latines, theflower of whose youth was there all flain and killed up Æmylius led his Army against Pedum. As for the Pedans they had maintenance from Tybur, Prenefte, and Velitern, who took their parts : there came also aid from Lancoum and Antium. Where the Roman Conful, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for E that there remained behind a new piece of service about the City it self Pedum, and the Camp of their Confederats which was adjoyned close to the Town: all or a sudden he gave over the war unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul, He also himself returned to Rome, and called earnessly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied stally; that unless he either forced Pedumby affault, or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Æmylius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Confulfhip afterward like to the feditious Tribunes. For follong as he was Conful he ceafed not to charge and accuse the Nobies before the people; and his Collegue no whit gainfaid him as being himfelf one of the Commoners. He took occasion of these accusations upon this that the lands in the Latine and Falern Countries, were divided in F pinching and scant measure among the Commons. And after that the Senat desirous to atridge the time of the Confuls government, had decreed that a Distator should be declared against the Latine rebels; Emylius (who'e turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own compapion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horse. This Di-Chatorship was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of slandrous and accusatory Investives made against the Nobles; and for that it enacted three Statutes,most favourable and pleasing to the Commons, and as cross and adverse to the Nobility: first, That the Acts devised and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome: lecondly, That all laws which were proposed and to pass by the suffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles should allow G and approve: thirdly, That for a much as they were come thus far already, that both the Cenfors might be of the Commons, now one Centor at the least should be a Commoner of necesfity. Infomuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more loft at home this year by these Confuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Eurius Camillus and Q. Menius were Confuls, to the end that Empliis the Conful of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting, slip of a victory that should have been atchieved in his year, the Senat began to mutter in their speeches, that Pedum by sorce of arms, by valour of men, & all possible means what soever, H should be destroyed and rased to the ground. Whereupon the new Consuls being forced to lav ande all other affairs, and to go in hand with that service, first took their journey thither. Now was Latinm grown to those terms, as they could neither abide war nor endure peace. To maintain the wars they wanted means; and peace they could not away with nor abide to hear of never fince the loss of their lands, so they thought best to hold a middle courie; to sland upon their guard; and to keep themselves within their towns: that the Romans being not provoked, should make no quarrel of war: and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguered, there might be aid tent from all parts to the befreged, And yet for all this, were the Pedans succoured but of very few. The Tiburtins and Praneftins, who fecountry lay nearest came to Pedum. But for the Ari- I cins Lanuvins, and Veliternes, who joined their forces with the Antiats and Volscians, were suddenly affailed and fet upon near the river Aftura by Menius, and vanquished. Camillus sought before Pedum with the Tiburtins, who came into the field with a right puissant army, and put him to much trouble and hazard: howbeir, he had as good fuccess in the end as Menius. The greatest tumult and trouble was caused especially by occasion of a sudden sally of the townsmen in the very time of the conflict. Against whom, after that Camillus had opposed part of his forces to make head, he not only drave them within the wals, but the same day also, when he had discomfitted both them and their succours, he scaled the town and was Master thereof. Then it was thought good, with greater preparation of power and couragious resolution, after the winning of that one City to go about with the victorious army from one to another and so to subdue and tame for e- K ver the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither rested they, untill partly by main force, and partly by taking one City afterlanother by way of furrender, they had brought all Latium under their subjection. After this having disposed and placed garrisons in every town which they had got, they departed to Rome for triumph : which was to them by a general confent of all men granted, Besides their triumph, this honour was to them done, that two statues of horsemen (a tare thing in those duies should be erected for them in the Grand place called Forum.

The O ation of Camillus to the Senat of

But before that they gathered the suffrages of the people, in the assembly for Election of Coss. against the year following, Camillus in this wise made a speech to the Senat, touching the Latine nations. "My LL and Senators of Rome, That which by war and force of arms was to bedone in "Latium, is now by God his goodness and the valour of our fouldiers brought to good pass, The L "Armies of our enemies slain before Pedum and Astrua: The Latine towns all, and Antum a Ci-"ty of the Volicians either by force won, or rendred by composition, are now held and kept to "your behoof by your own garrifons. It remaineth now to confult (forasmuch as they trouble us oft by rebellion) and to devile some means how to keep them quiet in continual peace. In this "consultation, the immortal gods have given you thus much power to resolve upon, that it lieth " wholly in your hands, to chuse whether Latium shall continue still a nation or no: and therfore "may ye for ever procure your selves repose and security from thence either by rigour & punish-"ment, or by clemency and pardon, chuse you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of cru-"elty against those that have yielded themselves, and are vanquished? Ye may, indeed, destroy all "Latium, and make all wast and a defart wilderness, from whence oftentimes in fundry and dan-M "gerous wars of yours ye have had the help of an army of Allies, & found them fast and valorous. "But wil ye(as your ancestors have done before you) enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving un-"to your City those whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter & means to grow up stil and " wax mighty, to your great honour and glory, Surely, that government & dominion is of all other "most strong and sure, wherein the subjects take joy in their obedience. But what loever you mean "to determine in this behalf, ye had need to make speed and resolve betimes, So many nations ye "ho'd in sulpence of mind between fear and hope: and therefore behoofeful it is, that you both frid and deliver your felves (as foon as you can) of the care they put you to; and also whiles their heads are busied and minds unresolved (standing as they do amazed in doubtful expectation) "either by punishment or by benefit, to forestal and prevent them before they take heart again, N "For our part, it was hitherto our endeavour to effect and bring about, that ye might be able to " dispose of all at your pleasure, and as you would your selves: now your duty it is to determine "what is best for your selves and the Common-weal. The Lords and chief of the Senar praised this motion of the Coi, and deemed good in general. But for almuch as the condition of the parties was divers, and their cause not all one, they faid that they might resolve and determine best, according to the defert of each flate, if they were specified by name, and the opinions asked in particular, So they fell to consultation of them severally as they were propounded; and set down this order and decree, Imprimis, that the Lanuvins be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and enjoy again their own religion and facred ceremonies, with this proviso, that the chappel and grove of Juno Softita should be common to the Burgesses of Lanuvium and the people of Rome, Item, that the O Aricins Nomentans, and Pedans, shall be made denizens of Rome, and endued with the liberties and priviledges of the Lanuvins. Item, that the Tusculans retain still that freedom of their City fafe, which as then they enjoyed : and the crime and attainder of rebellion, to be charged upon a few of the chief to fave the common flate from danger. Item, that there should be grievous punishment inflicted upon the Veliterns, who being ancient Roman Citizens, had not with thanding so often taken arms and rebelled: that their wals should be dismantled and rased: their Senators from thence translated, and confined beyond Tyberis, there to dwell, upon pain, that

A wholoever were found on this fide the water, it might be lawfull for any man to take him as his prisoner, and to ransom him at a * 1000 Asses. Provided alwaies, that he should not enlarge him, *52 sh, 6.d nor release him of his Irons, until the money were fully satisfied and paid. Into the postessions serl, and lands of those Senators, were tenants and Coloners sent to inhabit: who being once enrolled. Velure seemed again as populous as beforetime. At Antium was there a new Colony planted, with this provifo that the ancient inhabitants of the Antiats should be permitted (if they themselves would) to be enrolled there, and remain fill. From thence were their long Gailies and war-flips had away, and the people of Antium wholly forbidden the fea: but the freedom of Roman Citizens to them was granted. The Tyburts and Prenettins forfeited their lands, not for their late tref-B pass of rebellion, common with other Latines, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Romans had in times past joyned arms with the Frenchmen, a savage and unsociable nation, From the other Latines Cities and States, they took away the priviledge of marriage, the commerce of traffick, and entercourse of mutual intelligences, and holding counsels themselves, for ever after. To the Campain Gentlemen that served with horse aforesaid, for that they would not give content to revolt with the Latines: to the Fundans also and Formans, through whose country they had alwaies had free, fafe, and quiet paffage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made Citizens of Rome; but without the liberty of giving voices. Item, it was decreed, that the Cumans and Sueffulans, should be of the same condition and state that Capua was. The Ships of the Antiates were part of them transported to the Arienal at Rome, and the rest set on fire and burned. With the stems, beakheads, and brazen pikes whereof, it was thought good, that the pulpit of common pleas and Orations in the grand place of Rome, should be beautified and adorned: which publike Pulpit was thereupon called Roftra.

Whiles (. Sulpitius Longus, and P. Elius Petus were Confuls, when as the Romans held peaceably under their dominion, all the countries, as well through the favour which they won by bountitul dealing as by might and strong hand, there arose war between the Sidicins and Auruncians, The Aurun i, who had yielded afore to T. Manlins Conful, and were taken into protection afterwards rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seek for aid at the Romans hand. But before that the Confuls had led forth their power out of the City (for the Senate had commanded, that the Aurunci should be defended stidings came, that the Aurunci for D fear had quit their town: and being fled with their wives and children, had fortified Sinnessa, which now at this day is called Aurunea: and that the ancient wals, with the town it felf, were by the Sidicins deltroyed. Hereat the Senate offended with the Confuls, by whose delay and lingring their allies had been betraied in time of their necessity, ordained a Dictator to be chosen. So there was elected C. Cloudius Regillensis, who appointed for General of horiemen C. Claudius Hortstor. But hereupon rose a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictator. And when the Augurs had pronounced, that they thought him not rightly created, both Dictator and General of horiemen gave over their rooms. The same year Minutia, a Vestal Nun, was first sufpected of incontinency, for going in her apparel more trim than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that brought in question and accused by a bond-servant, that infor-E med against her to the High Priests. First, by a decree of theirs she was awarded to abstain from divine service, to keep her house, and not to manuprise and set free any of her bond-slaves, but to have them forth coming, whenfoever they were called for: and after farther examination and judgement passed, was buried quick under the ground, at the gate Collina, in the paved causey on the right hand, within the plain or field called Scelerates, i.e. Exectable or polluted. I suppose that place took the name of such * incest of filthy whoredom. The same year, Q. Publica Philo was ele- * Simple forcted Practor, the first that ever was of the Commons, notwithstanding the mind of Sulpitius the continency in Conful, who faid, That he would not take his name to propound it for Election nor admit him a protested among other compititors, But the Senat flrived the less in impeaching this Prætorship, eeing they Vorary was could not have their will in the highest rooms and dignities.

The year next enfuing, under the Confulfhip of L. Papirius Craffus and Cafo Duellius, was notable and famous for the war of the Aufonians, in regard rather of the novelty, than the greatness and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabited a town called Cales, and had joyned their power with the Sidicins their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being difcomfitted in one battel, and the same not so memorable, was for the nearness of their Cities more ready to flie, and in their flight more fale and secured. Yet the Nobles of Rome omitted not the care of that war: for that the Sidicins so often, either had themselves moved war, or aided those that began, or else were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could to make Conful the fourth time, the noblest warriour in those daies, M. Valerius Corvinus, who had for his brother in government M. Attilius Regulus. And lest haply some errour by chance G should be committed, wit was made to the Consuls, that extraordinarily, and without casting lot, that province might fall to Corvinus: who having received the Army (after the victory at Cales) of the former Confuls, went forth. And when at the first shout and onset he had discomfitted his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted, he affaied to affault their very wals: and so eager and hotly bent (I assure you) were the souldiers, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making full account to scale up to the top, and enter the town. But Corvinus, because that was an hard adventure, was desirous to accomplish that enterprise by the long toil of his fouldiers, rather than their present perill the raised therefore a countermure, and platforms, and rolling frames, mounted against the wals: but as good H hap was by an opportunity that fell out they had no nie of these munitions and fabricks, For M. Fabius a Roman prisoner, taking vantage of the negligence or his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himfelf down by a long cord, fall ned at one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and flid by the arms, among the munitions and fabricks of the Romans: who to pertwaded and prevailed with the General that he caused him to give an affault upon the enemies, now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado were the Aufonians and their City surprised, as they were afore vanquished in fight. A great booty of pillage was there got: and after a garrison placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Conful by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that At- I tilius should not be without his glory too, both Coss, were appointed to lead forth an Army against the Sidicins: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senat, L. Emplies Manuercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Consuls. Who named Q. Publius Philo for his

General of horsemen. In this Election, holden by this Dictator, there were created Confuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Po-Abumius. Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicins war, yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longing beforethey spake themselves; proposed an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained that two thousand and five hundred men should be enrolled and affigned thither; they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely, Cafe K Duellius, T. Quintins, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Confuls having received the army of the old, entred into the enemies confines, wasting all before, untill they came to the very walls of their City, Now, for that the Sidicins had affembled a puiffant army, and feemed themselves fully retolute and bent upon utter despair to put all unto the last adventure, and to fight it out to the last man, Moreover, because it was noised that all Samnium was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senate, the Consuls appointed P. Cornelius Ruffinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horie, But hereupon grew again another feruple, that there was some errour escaped in the creation: so they resigned up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for Elections of Magistrates had been touched and infected with that errour and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interreign, Which being now entred L upon by the fifth Interregent, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Confuls were created, L. Cornelius the second time and Cn. Domitius.

When all things else were at quiet, she rumour of the Gauls war was so rise and hot, that it was taken for a very Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And M. Papirius Crassus was nominated, who had P. Valerius Publicola for General of the horsemen. When they had mustred the souldiers more streightly and with greater regard than would have been for wars near hand, the espials who were sent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Samnium now the second year was ready to drop out of their allegeance and feek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicin country, Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Epirus, drew the Samnits into M the Lucans country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battel, as he made rodes from Pefus. In which cooffict, Alexander having got the upper hand, entred into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted, with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affairs prospered as well. The same year was a solemn Levy or Numbring of the people of Rome held, and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed, Melia and Captia: the Leviers that ordained them, were Publ. Philo, and Sp. Posthumius. The Acerrans became Roman Citizens, by anact proposed by L. Papirius the Prator: by vertue whereof they were enfranchifed Denizens, but without the priviledge of giving voices. These were the acts for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following (were it through the unkind distemperature of the air, or by some N wicked practice of man) was infamous, when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Valerius were Confuls, I find the furname of this Conful to vary in divers Chromicles, in some Flacous, in others Potitus. But it matters not much whether be true, This rather I could willingly have wished (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been fallely recorded, That those persons by sorcery and poifon were made away, whose death hath defamed that year with the note of a pestilence, But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpose to de iver it, lest that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptomes a certain chamber-maid presented her self to Q. Fabius Maximus (being for the time an Ædile of State) and professed to bewray the cause of that publike and contagious malady, if the might be affured by faithfull promife from him, that by the 0 utterance thereof, she should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabins delivered this matter to the Confuls: and the Confuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the confent of which State affurance was made accordingly unto the party aforelaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared, that by the lewd and mischievous wickedness of women the City was thus afflicted; and namely, That certain Dames of Rome, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank polfons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it prefently they might be taken in the manner. So they went flraight waies with the wench, and found some women as they were

A feething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and some poyloned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20, of those dames, with whom the poyfons were found, were sent forby a Sergeant. Two of them Cornelias and Sergia, both noble women born, floutly flanding upon these tearms, and fliffy avouching, That they were soveraignmedicicines and whollom for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforefaid confuted, and enjoined to drink thereof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devited of her own fingers ends this falle flander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided afide to make them way. Now when as in fight of all the World. these two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not and B to having drunk the poyloned potion, they all perished by their own missiler our practice. Then presently were their complices apprehended, who detested aud discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170, were condemned, Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor process at Rome, about poyloning and forcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, belotted and bewitched, then to any fellonious intent of theirs, Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City, there was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonial satisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, C that for the fashing or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Cn. Quintilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was

Consuis then were created, L. Papirius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantins Venox. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volicians as Embaffadors to Rome, the Fabraterns and Lucans, making request that they would take them into their protection; promissing that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnits, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Samnits, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embaffage sped well and took place; not so much for that the Sambits defired D peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Privernats war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewife a Fundan, one Virruvius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house flood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and conficate, was called Vacci Prata. Against whom as he wasted and spoiled far and neer the Setin, Norban and Coran countries, L. Papirius went forth with a power, and refted not far from his very camp. But Vitruvius neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his fort. But having put his fouldiers in battel array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, whiles the fouldiers had more mind to flie backward, then march forward E and encounter the enemy : without either advise or confident courage he fought : and with as little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the easie retire into the camp so neer, he found no great trouble to save his souldiers from much slaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, and not many in the press of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfitted, made haste to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather then a trench. Plantim the other Coss. having from Privernum, overrun and forraged the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans as he entred into their confines met him, saying: 4. They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Virginius, or for those "that took his part; but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not "culpable for this war, Virruvius himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Pri-" vernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativi-"ty. And therefore at Privernum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for and purfued, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolted as well from the Fundans "as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Funds, they were at peace with Rome, may, they were "Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated there-"fore and belought the Conful to forbear hostility with a guiltless people: assuring him that their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devo-"tion of the people of Rome. The Conful after that he had commended the Fundans, and fent letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum. But before he diflodged (as Clacdius writeth) the Conful executed those that were the heads of the confpiracy, and three hundred and fitty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundan people, desirous to be excuted and ducharged, with the punishment of the needy and base fort of people. Now when as Privernum was befreged and invefted with two Corfular Armies, the one of the Confuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were erested in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horses and their charriots are let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well past the care of the Privernars war, there H arrived a terrib e and fearful brute of the Gauls war, which never was regarded fleightly of the Nobles of Rome, Incontinently therefore the new Confuls, L. Emplius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius, on that very day, namely, on the * Calends of Iuly, wherein they entred their offices, were commanded to determinand agree between themselves upon their Provinces: and Mamereus who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immunity and exemption from warfare, Moreover and besides, even the poor handicrasts men and artifans, such as keep their shops, and live by sedentary occupations, a fort far unmeet for martial fervice, are faid to have been called forth, and prest to the wars: and a mighty army was assembled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: Forit I was thought good that they should now go farther forward, for fear left the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown, they diverted their forces from the Gauls, and bent all against Privernum. But the issue hereof is reported two manner of ways, some write that the City wasforced by affault, and that Virunia came alive into their hands; others, that before the utmost extremity of assault was used, they of their own accords, carrying before them white wands in token of peace, yeelded themselves unto the Conful: and that Purmoins by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Virruvius and the Privernats, fent for the Conful Planting to triumph, after that he had difmantied the walls of Privernum, and II there placed a firing garrison: and they gave order in the mean time that Paravius should be kept fast in prisonuntil the Consuls return, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed alfo that his habitation in Palatiam should be pulled down, and his goods confectated to their Idol Semon Sangus. And look what money [of brass] was raised thereof, it served to make brasen round Plates, which were offered and fet up in the Chappel of Sangus towards the temple of Quirinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliterns, beconfined beyond Tybris, and there dwell. These Acts being thus fet down, there was no more talk of the Privernats until the triumph of Plantins. After the triumph, the Conful having executed Vitruvius and his complices, supposing now that hee I might fafely propound the cause of the Privernats, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly fatisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders, "Since that (quoth he) my LL, of the "Senar, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immor-"tal gods, and at yours, suffered now already condigne punishment; what is your further plea-"fure, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmless multitude? For my part verily, " although I be rather to demand your opinions then deliver mine own: yet feeing the Priver-" nats neer neighbors unto the Samnits, with whom we now at this time entertain a most uncer-"tain and flippery peace, I would have as little grudge and rancor left as may be, between us and "them, As the question in it self was doubtful and ambiguous, whiles mengave advice some to proceed cruelly, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: so, there ! was one of the Privernat Embassadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of square; a man mindful of that flate wherein he was born more than of his prefentneed and extremity. Who being demanded of one (that had spoken to the point, and delivered some sharp censure and heavy sentence against them) What punishment he judged the Privernats deserved? Marry (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deem themselves worthy of liberty and freedom. At whole flout and arrogant answer, when the Consul saw those to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privernats: to the end that he himself by some mild and gentle demand might drawfrom the party more modest language: What (quoth he) if we should remit and pardon your punishment; what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye shall find it on our part loyal and perpetual: but N if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye shall have it last but a small while. But then one gave out, that the Privernat began to threaten plainly: and faid moreover, that such speeches were enough to flir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senat drew these his answers to a better sense, and said that it was the speech of a man, and of a man free born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, nay, any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he misliketh and goeth against hisstomach? There only is peace sure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keep themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty. where they will impose thraldom and servitude. And to this purpose the Conful himself especially moved and enclined their hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give their opinions, and that so loud, as he might of many more be over-heard, That they above allother, and none burthey indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens, who minded and efleemed nothing in the world, but their freedom. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their fuit: and also by the authority of the LL, a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernits might be enfranchited Romans.

The fame year were three hundred fent as a Colony, to inhabit Anxio: and had two Acres of ground a peece allowed them. The year following was memorable in no respect, eithered huntred as the colonial property of the colon

A home affairs or forraign, in the time of P. Plaatius Proculat, and P. Cornelius Scapula Coff. Only this fell out that years that in Fregella (which sometime was in the territory of the Sidicins, and after, of the Volicians), bether was a Colony planted and unto the people there was given a dole, or distribution of raw flesh amongst them, by Marcut Flavius, at the suneral of his mother. Some there were that thought, how inder a colour of honoring his mother, he defrayed and paid into the people a deserved nire 8x reward, in that when he was by the Ædiles arrested & brought to his answer for adultery committed with a Dame or married Wife in the City, the people had by their voices acquit him. This dole given for a favour past at his trial, was the occasion also of a dignity following: for in the next Election, not withstanding he were absent, he was preferred to the Tri-Bunship of the Commons, even before those Competitors that were present in place.

There flood cometime the City Palapolis, not fat from thence whereas now Naples flandeth. In those two Cities, one and the same people inhabited, descended and deriving their beginning from Cumes, and the Comansfetch their off-fpring from Chalcis in Eubaa. With that fleet wherein they failed from their own country, they were able to do much at fea, and were mighty upon those coalts where they dwelt. And first landing in the Islands Exaria and Pitheousa, asterwards they adventured to feat themselves in the main and continent. This City relying and trusting in their own power, as well as prefuming upon the faithless and disloyal society of the Samnits with the Romans, or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a pessilence that raigned in in the City of Rome, wrought much mischief and hostility against such Romans as inhabited the Campain and Falern Countries. Whereupon, when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Publius Philo Consuls, the second time) there were Facials sent to Palapolis, for to demand restitution again, and a proud answer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation more front and valiant in tongue then in deed and execution; by the authority of the Senar, the people decreed, that there should be war made upon the Palæpolitans. And when as the Consuls had divided their provinces between themselves, it fell to Publica his turn to war upon those Greeks. Cornelius with another army was opposed against the Samnits if they should hap to sir any way, For the report went, that they looking and expesting affuredly the revolt of the Campains, would encamp neerer and join with them. There, Cornelius thought it best to keep a standing camp. The Senat was certified from both Confuls, That they had small hope of peace with the Sam-D nits. Publius gave intelligence, that two thousand Nolan souldiers, and four thousand Samnits, were rather by the compulsion and importunity of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Palapolis. At Rome it was for certain known, that in Samnium there were new multers taken by the Magistrates direction, and that the whole country, and the people adjoining, were raised, and out in arms. Moreover, That the Privernats, Fundans, and Formians were without all diffimulation follicited and moved to rebel. Upon which causes, it was advised by the Senat, first to send Embassadors to the Samnits, before they made war: and from them they had an infolent answer. And they themselves made quarrel, and charged the Romans with wrongs offered fiff: and nevertheless they justified themselves for any thing by them done, and answered all objections that were laid against them full stoutly. "Namely, that the Greeks E " were not aided by any publick counsel or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundans and Formi-"ans by them follicited, as who need not be ashamed of their own power, but thought themfelves sufficient enough to war if they listed. Thus much moreover, they could not different ble, but fpeak it out in plain tearms. That the Nation and Senat of the Samnits take it in ill part, that the people of Rome had be edified and repaired Fregella, a town by them conquered, "and won from the Volicians, and by them laid ruinate; and not only so, but they had placed "a Colony also in the Samnits Country, which the inhabitants called Fregella. Which contu-"mely and reproachful injury, unless they that were the authors thereof would do their beft to "abolifh and cancel, they would with all their might and main repel it from them. And when as the Roman Embaffadormade a motion, and would have had them to put the matter for to be decided unto the common Confederates and friends of both parties; What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnits?) What jugling is here to no purpose? As for the quarrels and differences between us (O ye Romans) neither the babling words of Embassador, nor yet any days man or arbitrator, burthe very Campain field, wherein we must encounter in earnest, even dint of fword, and the spears point, and the doubtful chance of battel shall determin. And therefore encamp we between Capua and Sueffula, in the fight one of another, and let us then try the iffue, whether Samnit or Roman shall be Lord of Italy. The Embassadors of Rome made aniwer, that they were not rogo whither the enemy called them, but whither their General and Captains led them. In this mean while Publius had already got a convenient piece of ground between Palapolis and Naples, and thereby empeached the enemies of the mutual entercourse of fuccors from the one to the other, which they had used reciprocally, as either place had need, and was diffrested. Therefore, when as the time of Election of Magistrates at Rome drew on apice. and expedient it was not for the Common-weal that Publim (now approaching neer the enemies walls, and ready to affault) (hould be called away from the hope which dayly he had of winning the City; the Tribuns were dealt withal, to propose an Actunto the people. That when the time of Pub. Philo his Confulfhip should be expired, he might in quality and name of Proconful, remain in government, until the war with the Greeks were fully ended. And unto L. Corneline were letters fent, implying thus much, That whereas it was not thought good, that he now being entred into Samnium, should be called away from the chief push of the war, he should nominate a Dictator to be President of the Election of Magistrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of horie Sp. Polihumius. Yet for all this, was no affembly for the faid election, holden by the Dictator, Forit came in question, Whether he were rightly (reated or no. And the Augurs being hereabout confulted with, pronounced, "That the Dictator feemed not created aright, But the Tribuns discredited and made inspicious "and infamous, by their accusatory speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That neither it was easie to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Consul nominated "the Dictaior in the beginning of the still night, neither had the Consul written to any man pub-" lickly or privatly thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and say, that he either I 6 faw or heard ought, that might mar and interrupt the Auspices, nor yet could the Augurs st "ting at Rome, guess and divine, what error had hapned to the Consul in the camp so far off, And "who faw not (fay they) that the Augurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elect. " was a Commoner? These and other such allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribuns given out. For the matter grew to an Interreign, and the foresaid Election being stil put off and adjourned for one cause or other; at length the fourteenth Interregent, L. Emplius Created Confuls, C. Petilius, and L. Papirius, furnamed Mugillanus of Curfor, as I find in other Chro-

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epicurus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished person, to verifie the O-K racle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was fent for into Italyby the Tarentins, he had warning given him, [To take heed of the Acherufian Water, and the City Pandofia, for there it was his destiny to end his days :] and therefore, with more speed he passed over into Italy, to be as far off as might be, from the City Pandofia in Epirus, and the river Acheron; which issuing out of Molosis into the lower Meers and Lakes, dischargeth it self, and falleth into the Thesprotian Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men seek most to flie and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrown the legions of the Brutians and Lucans; won by force Heracleaa Colony of the Tarentines, and Confentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and allo Acerina a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Meffapians and Lucans: fent into Epirusthreehun-l dred Noble houses and samilies, whom he meant to keep as hostages: he encamped not far from Pandofia, a City fituate neer to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians. And there he held three hils somewhat distant a funder, from whence he might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200, banished men of the Lucans, for his fure trufty guard: who notwithstanding (as the natures are of such for the most part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now it fellout fo, that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and ftopped the passages three ways between his armies, so as they could not help one another: whereby those two garrisons where the King was not in person, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the fword, turned their whole forces to befiege the King, N From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, meffengers sent to their own countrimen : who in the name of the rest capitulated, that if they might be restored again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himself with an elect number of men, madea noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midft of the enemies: and encountring the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men near together, who were scattered asunder in fight, he came at length to a river, which by the fresh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had born down, shewed passage. Which as the army passed over at an unknown and blind foord, one souldier wearied with seat and travel, curfing and detefting the unlucky and abominable name of the River, fortuned to fay, Thou hast not thy name * Acheros for naught: which word when it came once to the King his N ear, he presently began to think and muse of his final end; and there stayed still in a deep suspence whether he shall pass over or no. Then Sotimus, one of the Kings servitors and liegemen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in fo great a peril and jeopardy ashe was? and shewed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play false with him, and sought opportunity to sorelay and do him a mischief. With that the King looked behind him, and espied them afar off in troop coming against him: whereupon he drew his sword, put his horse to it, took the River, and rode through the midft thereof, and when he was now fo far passed that he was ready to take the land, one of those banisht Lucans lanced a dart aloof at him, and struck him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart flicking in his body, and the ftream carried it down as far as to the Corp, do guard of the enemies. Where his breathless corps was 0 shamefully missied and mangled. For they having cut it cross the middle, sent the one half to *Consentia, and kept the other with themselves still, to practise a thousand villanies upon it, And as they shot and slung stones at it afar off, a certain woman being amongst this outragious multitude (raging beyond all measure of anger and malice that mans heart can devile or beleeve) after the had befought them to forbear a while, with her eyes guthing out tears faid unto them That her husband and children were prisoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings body, howloever it were abused and martyred, to redeem them again. The same year was there a Lectistern at Rome, (which was the fift after the foundation and Bbuilding of that City) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore. Afterwards, the new Confuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, fent defiance and proclamed war against the Samnits. And as they themselves made greater preparation; every way than against the Greeks so they had besides new aids, whereof (as then) they least thought of ; The Lucans and the Apnians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by form of Covenant and leagueentertained and received into their amity. At the same time also the Romans had good fuccels in the Samnits quarters : for three towns there yeelded unto them, and they became Masters thereof, to wit, Allife, Callife, Ruffrium; all the territory besides at the first coming of the Conful, was pilled and spoiled far and near. These exploits thus prosperously c atchieved, the other enterprize also of belieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of anend. For over and belides, that by certain sconces and bloccuzes between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own walls, much more mifery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatned without and as if they had been captives to their own garrison fouldiers, whom they had called to them for their defence, they fuffered infinite villanies, and indignities, in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardest extremities, that follow upon Cities forced by the enemy. And therefore when it was notifed abroad, that there were new fuccours coming from Tarentum and the Samnits: they supposed that for Samnits; there were already within their walls more of them then they would marry, as for Tarentins they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withftand, the outrages of the Samnits and Nolans, as the Romans their open and professed enemies. Last of all, of many inconveniencies that they were driven unto, the least and easiest, was thought, to yeeld simply unto the Romans. Charilaus and Nymphius two great men and the chiefe personages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, fo parted the matter between themselves, that the one should flie unto the Roman General, and the other stay behind, to find some opportunity, and minister ready meanes to render the City according to their delignment, Charilaus was the man who presented himselfunto Philo, and said noto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it faid and done of the Palæpolitans and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and fur-"render the City into your hands: in which Astion, whether I may be thought to have be-E "trayed or faved my country, it refleth only in the truit and fidelity of the Romans. As for my "felfe privatly, I am come neither to indent, nor yet to (rave ought at all: but publickly in the "behalf of the City, I would rather by way of petition requell, than article and capitulate, thus "much, That if this enterprise intended, speed well and take effect, the people of Rome would "think and consider, in what affection, endevour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into "their amity, rather than upon what folly and rashness, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 3000 fouldiers, to keep, insprize, and to seize that quarter of the City, where the Samnits were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and garrison, L. Quintins a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphius also did his part, and dealt so craftily under hand with the Pretor of the Samnits, that he induced and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Palapolis or in Sammem, he would permit him with the fleet to cast about to the Roman coasts, for that he intended to forrage and waste, not only the maritine parts, but the territories also adjoyning to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships presently must lanch forth, and be iet affoat. And to effect this more speedily, all the youth of the Samnits befides the necessary garrison of the City, was tent to the shoar. Where whiles Nymphizu in the dark, and amongst the multitude that hindred one another purposely, spent time in setting confusedly, some to this and others to that, Charilaus, according to the complot set before, was by his affociats received into the City: and having filled the highest places of the town Gwith Roman souldiers, commanded to set up a shout, whereat the Greeks upon a secret tokengiven them by their Captains, kept themselves still and quiet. The Nolans then, at the backfide of the town, escaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nola. And the Samnits being excluded out of the town, as they had a more readier mean to flie for the present, so they found it, after they were past danger, a more shameful diigrace. For, they were disarmed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongst the enemies, and returned home spoiled, poor and needy and served for a laughing stock and derision, not only to other nations, but also to their own neighbors and countrimen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion opinion, whereby it is given out that Palapolis was by the Samnits betrayed: yet as I have cre- H dited and followed herein such authors, as me thinks it were hard if they should not delivera truth; for fo I am induced the rather to believe that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief feat of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appear red clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the enemies were ramed, and so constrain ned to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours hapned to this man abbie all others before him, namely, the prorogation of his government, not granted to any man aforetime;

Upon the tail of this war, arole another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Ta- I rentins having been the Palapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their City, complained themselvs like men forfaken, and not as those who had forfaken others, much blaming the Palæpolitans, and with anger and envy raging against the Romans, Disquieted also they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Applians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans, For now (fay they) they are Well near come unto us, and shortly we shall grow to this pais that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazzard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnits war, and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the same nothing mighty, remaineth now; fince that the Lucans are gone and revoked to the Romans: who yet might be reclai- K med and moved to shake off the society with the Romans, if any feat were wrought and practifed to fow some discord and dissention between them. These devices and overtures took place and prevailed with such, as were desirous of change and novelty: in so much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than trusted and reputed honest, amongst their countrimen and fellow Citizens, hired also for a sum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the assembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and said, that for presuming only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Coff, thus scourged, & escaped narrowly the lofing of their heads. The thing it self piteous and unleamly to behold, as bearing a shew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & fubtil practice by them intended firred the prople up, to force their Magiltrates with their uncessant outcries to assemble a Councel, Some Han- I ding round about the Senat in councel, call hard for war against the Romans: others run up and down to raise the mukitude of Peazants to take arms and in this fir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were well minded, a decree passed; that the league with Samnits should be renued, and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a fudden change: and as it had no colour of cause, so it carried small credit with it amongst the Samnits, who forced the Lucanians to give hostages; and to take garrifons into their fortresses: and they, blinded with anger, and invegled with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after beganthe fraud to appear and shew it self namely, after that the authors and devisers of these false surmises and flanders, were retired to Tarentum: but having put themselvs out of all, and being not at liberty to dispose of their own affairs chey had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain, h

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty, in that they were no more either bound in chairs, or held in thraldom by their creditors. Which priviledg against poor debtors, was altered, by occasion of the filthy lust and notorious cruelty of one Usurer. And L. Papirius was the man unto whom C. Publicus for his fathers debt, became bound, and configned himselfhis prisouer; whose tender age and lovely favor which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Ufurer to unkind luft and shameful contumely: for making ful account, that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfie and pay for the interest of the debt, he first began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchast speeches: afterwards seeing that his ears abhorred to hear such filthines, hefel to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mird of his present condition wherin he stood: but last of all perceiving by him, that he stood more N upon his honor and freedom by birth then respected his hard estate by fortune, he caused him to be stripped naked, and whipping chear to be presented unto him. The poor stripling thus piteously rent and torn, ran forth into the open freet, complained of the filthy luft & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon, a number of people, enkindled as well with pity and commiseration of the stripling, and indignity of the injury, as also in regard of their own case, and of their children came running into the Forum or common place, and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Councel, The Confuls upon this indden uproar were forced to call a Senat, and as the Senators entred into the Councel chamber, they lay all profitat at their feet, as they paffed by, one after another, & shewed unto them the young mans back and fides in what taking they were. And that one day, by occasion of the outragious enormity of one person, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to 0 that day, the creditors had their debtors, in danger unto them, For the Conff, had in charge, to propose unto the people, that from thence forward, no person whatsoever, unless he had committed fome heinous fact, and until he wereto suffer therefore, should be either kept in fetters and gives, or stretched upon the rack. Item, that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So, they that were in bondage, became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The same year, whiles the Samnits war of it self alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans,

A together with the Tarentins the hatchers thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perlexity enough: behold over and above all thele, the Vestin people, as a surcrease to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnits. Which new occurrent as, for that year it rather maintained this discourse amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than ministred cause of serious debating if publick Councel: fo the Confuls of the year following, L. Furius Camillus the fecond time, and Jan. Brutus Sceva, thought no one thing more important than it, and needful to be treated of in the Senat, with the first. And albeit the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet fo greatly were the LL, hereabout troubled, that they feared no lets to begin to take in hand. then to neglect it altogether, and not to fee it doubting, left if they were let go unpunished, the B neighbor nations would grow too lufty and proud : and again, if they feemed to chaffile them by war, the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marsians, the Pelignians and Marucins, were in feats of arms comparable and equal to the Samnits every way which nations they might be fure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Vestins, and touched them once never so little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present, seemed to carry more courage and valor, then fage advice and wildom: but the iffue and event shewed, that, Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles decreed war against the Vestins: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium tell to Camillus, To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and induftry employed in the defence C of the marches and frontiers, the enemies were impeached for joining their forces together. Howbeit the Conful Furius Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, fortuned to fall grievously fick, and thereby could not follow the wars: who being commanded to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warriour in those days, L. Papirius Curfor: by whom Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named General of horiemen, a couple furely of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, at thieved in this their government: but yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell between them; whereby they grew well near to the utmost tearms of contesting one another in all extremity. The other Conful warted with the Vestins many and fundry ways, but evermore with like fortune and happy fucceis. For he forraged and watted their country: and p by pilling, rifling, and burning their houses and corn, forced them against their wills into the field : and in one battel to enfeebled and abated the forces of the Vellins (but not without bloodthed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp; but also as not trufting now to their ramparts and trenches, they were confirmined to fleal away into their towns, minding for to fave themselves, as well by the natural scituation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made affault upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Cutina by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his souldiers, or their anger, being so chased as they were at their hurts received : for that scarcely one escaped out of the throng and skirmish, clear & not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingilia: and gave the pillage of both Cities to his fouldiers, Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way and keep E them out, But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Auspices and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof took not effect in the main event and iffue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papirius the Dictator, advised by the Pullarius [that had the custody and charge of the facred Pullets] went back to Rome to take the Aufpicium [or the prefage by the bird-flight] again: and straightly charged his General of horseto keep himself close within his hold, and in no wife to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Fabins after the Dictators departure, advertised by the espials, that theenemies were even as careless as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Roman in Samnium? whether it were, that being a flour and lufty young Gentleman, he took foul foorn and thought it an indignity, that all should seem to rest in the Dictator only: or that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wot not:) but he went forth with an army in order of battel, to Imbrinium, (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnits. But such was the happy iffue of this battel, that if the Dictator himself had been there in perion, it could not have been better managed. For, neither Captainfailed his fouldiers, not fouldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Cominius a Colonel by his place, (who sundry times charged and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbridled their horses, and so ran them all on the spur; that no strength was able to abide them: fuch an havock, such a lane made they all about over armour and men. The sootmen seconding. this hot charge of the horse, advanced the ensigns against the enemies thus put in disarray: and Stwenty thouland men (by report) were that day flain. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictators absence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battel. In some Chronicles the whole matter is passed over and let out clean,

The General of the horse, having gained a mighty mass of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon fo great a slaughter & massacre gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made fome fuch vow to one of the gods: or (as I, list rather to believe, it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dicta, should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entitle his name thereto; or in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.

Moreover, the letters of this victory by him fent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in so ill part, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory atchieved, he only shewed anger and sadness in his very countenance. Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great hast out of the court, giving out and often iterating these words; Then hath the master of horsemen in deed as well everted and overthrown, both Dictitors Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnies legions, if he can to go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my express commandment. Whereupon full of threats and indignation, he halfned to the camp, and took long journeys: yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vantentriers that I polled from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and ict upon punishment, and at every second word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Manlins. Then Fabins immediatly calling an audience, belought the fouldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from most deadly, and mortal enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outragious cruelty of the Dictatour, himselfe (1 12y) by whose conduct and sortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. "Fornow, coming he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and befide himself: for anger at an-"other mans manhood and felicity, jurious and horn-mad; and all is no more but this, that in his "absence, torsooth, we have sped well; who wisherh rather in his heart, if he could change the "course of fortune, that the Samnits had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is so K "rile in his mouth, as, That his commandment was contemned; as who would fay, he forbad "not battel with the same mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For as then his will was good, even for very envy to hinder and suppress the prowels of another, and wenta-"bout to take weapons away from most forward fouldiers, defirous of fight, that in his absence "they might not lay hand to their sword : so now, see how he fretteth and sumeth in great cho-"ler at this, that without L. Paprius the fouldiers were not disarmed, dismembred as it were, and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgat not his place, but bare himself as General of the . Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at receit, and waiting "at an in h when tome under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What "would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (as the fortune and L "doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worfe and loft the day; who " now that the enemies be vanquished, the field so well fought, the State so well served, asby "the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me "the General of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? But because he "cannot, now he dischargeth his gall upon mealone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, sear-"cheth and mounteth up to the highest, forunneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at "the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glory of M "this brave service, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatsoever he "might by law execute against a General of the Cavalry, he would attempt and extend, upon the "fimple ouldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that inflanding faft to me and in defence of my " canie, ye uphoid the liberty of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of "the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well feen in the battel, and that ye all " have a care and regard of the life and fafety of one, his stomack will come down, his heart wil "relent and incline to clemency, and a milder fentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole estate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for so long as the Legions of the Romans were isfe, thereshou'd no person do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently N by sound of trumpet immoned a general assembly. And the publick Crier after an Oiez made, called by name for Q Fabius General of the horse. Who so soon as he was come from a lower place where he was, and approached neer the Tribunal, (then quoth the Dictator) "I demand of thee Q. Fabiu, fince that the rule of the Dictator is foveraign and highest above all others, " whereunto the Confuls endued with kingly pullance and government, do obey, yea, & Prators " created with the same authority that Consuls are; whether thou esteem it meet and right, that a "General of horse should be obedient to his commandment or no? I demand likewise, whether I "my felf, knowing that I took my journey and went from home, with doubtful and uncertain Au-" Spices, ought to have put the mainthate of the Common-weal in hazzard against the order and religious observation in that behalf i and not rather, to go again to take new Anfpicia, that 10 cumight adventure & attempt nothing to long as I flood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods And withal, this I demand, whether the General of the horfemen could be treed, exempt, & dif-" charged of that scruple of conscience, which checked and stayed the Dictator from execution of "his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? seeing that if he had departed without " faying one word, yet thou shouldst have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according "to the interpretation of my wil and pleasure? Why sayest thou nothing? Answer me I say, Forbad "I thee not exprelly, to do any thing in my absence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies?

A"How dash thou in contempt of my commandment, whiles our Auspicia were uncertaine, "whiles our consciences were unresolved and with scruples troubled, against Military customs "and flatuts, against the disciplin of our ancestors, and against the will and direction of the gods: "how durft thou, I fay, be so hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To these interrogatories "make aniwer directly. Aniwer I charge thee, to all theie points, and nothing but theie, and at "the peril of thy life, not a word befides. Now come Serjeant and do thine office the while. To which leveral Articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: otherwhiles crying out aloud, that fooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his Bacts: and as he justified and excused his own fell, so he began again to challenge and accuse [the Dictator. Then Papirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of thehoriemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncased, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the fouldiers, whiles the Officers were a tearing and renting his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the affembly. From whence there arose an outcry over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threat. They who fortuned to stand next to the Tribunal, because that being within the view and eye of the Dictator, they might be known and noted, belought his Majetly to spare and pardon the General of the horie, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were farthelt off C in the skirt of the affembly, and especially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon such a rigorous and merciless Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compaals of the Tribunal all was not clear and quiet. The Lieutemants or Colonels of whole legions, standing about his feat or chair of state intreated him to put off thematter until the morrow : to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and refpit to consider of it with advice and counfel: saying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part," he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his victory had received disgrace and dishonour e-"nough. Beleeching him not to proceed to their extremities of utmost execution, nor to fet such "a brand and note of ignominy and shame upon the young Gentleman himself, so rare and gal-"lent a Knight; or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage, not yet upon the D" noble house and name of the Fabit. But when they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reasons they could alledge; then, they admonished him to have a regard to the furious affembly of the fouldiers: "and that it was not for a man of his years and wifdom, thus to put more fire to the hot stomack of Souldiers-enkindled already, nor to admini-" fler more matter of mutiny: and if fuch a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame "to Q. Fabrus, who fought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator; if he covercome with choler, should blindly so far pals himselte in wilful peevishness, as to provoke "the outragious multitude against himself. Finally, that he should not think, how they laboured "thus for any affectionate favour they bare to Q. Fabius; but were ready to take an oath, that "they thought it not fate for the State and Common-weal that he should proceed at such a time, E "to execute the rigor of Justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as "the Lieurenants had flirred up the Dictator his blood against themselves, rather then pacified his mood against Fabius, they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal And when as the Crier had affaied to make silence all in vain, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice nor any of his apparitors and halberds about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as if it had been a battel in field. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avouched unto him, that Papirius would proceed more vehemently, for that contesting of the Lieutenants, and that the more he was dealt withal the worle he was: Fabius privily Itole out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already F thrice Conful and Dictator, the Senat was called together immediatly. And as he was in the midit of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violence and wrong of the Dictator, all of a judden, there was heard before the Councel House door, a great noise and hurtying of the Listors, whiles they made way and voided the preis. And no marvel; for the Dictator himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For to foon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his light horiemen. Then began the broil to be renued afresh, and Papirius cansed Fabius to be attached. Whereupon the chief of the Nobility, and the whole body of the Senar began to enterpole themselves by way of mediation: but all their intreaty notwithstanding, he perfetted still in his implacable anger. Then stept forth M. Fabius the father. "For M. Fabius to as much as (od he) heither the authority of the Senat nor mine old age, whom you feek to make the Dictator. G"childless, nor yet the valor & noble courage of the General of horse, by your own self chosen and "nominated, can prevail mor any humble prayers which are able to appeale the fury of the ene-"my oftentimes, yea, and to pacifie the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawind help of the Tribuns, and to the whole body of the people I appeal, and fince that you challenge "and except against the judgement of your own army, and of the Senat, I offer and present unto "you that judge, who only is of more force and pullance, I am fure, than your Dictatorship, "I will see, whether you will weeld to this appeal, whereunto the Roman King Tull. Hostilius "give place. Then out of the Councel house they went straight to the Common place of audience:

and when the Dictator, attended with some sew, was ascended up, and the General of the Cavalry accompanied with all the whole troop of shechief of the City, Papirius commanded that he should come down or else be fetched from the Rostra, unto the lower ground. The sather followed after him. "Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought hither, from "whence we may be allowed to speak our minds, if we were no better then privat persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation. But afterwards the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise: who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and cruelty of Papirius. "What man (quoth he) I have been " also a Dictator of Rome my self, and yet was there never so much as a poor Commoner, no Cen-"turion, nor Souldier hardly entreated or missied by me. But Papirius seeketh victory and tri-"umph over a Roman Grand Captain and General, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his " enemies. See, fee, what difference there is between the government in old time, and this new " pride & cruelty of late days. Quintius Cincinnatus a Dictator for the time, proceeded no farther in " punishment against Minutius, when he was fain to deliver him lying enclosed & besieged with-"in his owncamp, but to leave him as a Lieutenant in flead of Conful, in the army whereofhe "had charge, M, Furius Camillus, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L, Furiet riss, who in contempt of his old age and authority, had fought most untowardly and with "diffionor in the end; and wrote nothing to the people or the Senat but well, of his Collegue:
"but also being returned, made a special reckoning of him above all the Tribuns consular, whom "also of all his collegues, when as hehad the choice granted him by the Senat, he elected to be k "his coadjutor in the charge of his government. Neither the people verily, whose power is So-" veraign over all, were ever more angry against those, that through rashnels and want of skill "loft whole armies, than to fine them at a fum of money. For the lofs and milicarriage of any battel, that a General should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never head "of to this day. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Com-"manders under the people of Rome, and those, who are conquerors and have deserved most just-" ly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What else I " pray you) should my son have endured, it he had beastly suffered the field to be lost and his ar-"my withal? If he had been discomfited, put to flight, and driven clean out of the field, how "far forth further would the Dictator his ire and violence have proceeded, than to scourge l "and kill? And see how fit and seemly a thing it is that the City for the victory of Q. Fabius, " should be in joy, in processions to the gods, and thankseivings, with congratulation and feast-"ing one another; and he himself by whose means the Temples stand open, the Altars smoak with "incense and facrifice, and are heaped up again with vows, oblations, and offerings, to be firipped in aked, to be whipped and torn in the fight of the people of *Rome.looking up to the Capitoland "the Cafile lifting up his eys to the gods upon whom in two fuch noble battels he called and in-"vocated, not in vain not without good and happy success? With what heart will the army take " this, which under his leading and conduct, and under his fortune, atchieved victory? What la-"mentation wil there bein the Roman camp and what rejoycing on the other fide among fithee-" nemies? Thus fared the good old father, thus pleaded he by way of expostulation and complaint, if calling upon God and man for help, and withal embraced his fon in his arms, and shed many a tear. "On the one fide, there made with young Fabius, and took his part, the majefly and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the affiftance of the Tribuns, and the re-"membrance of the army absent. On the other side were alledged against him by Papirius, the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare, the Dictators " commandment (observed and reverenced at all times, no less then the Oracle & wil of the gods) "the severe edicts of Manlius, whose fatherly love and affection to his dear son was set behind the "fervice and common good of the State, Alfo it was alledged, that the same exemplary justice, L. " Brutus the first tounder of the Roman liberty, executed in his two sons: and now mild and kind "fathers, indulgent and fond old men, in the case of contempt of other mens commandment, give " liberty to youth, and pardon as a imal matter, the overthrow of military disciplin Howbeit, he "for his part would perfift in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condigne punishment to him, "who contrary to his commandment, and notwithstanding the trouble and consusion of religion, "and the doubtful Auspicia, had given battel, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge "any jot the majesty of that State and Empire, for being everlasting: 10, L. Paprius would diminish "maught of the authority therof, wishing, That neither the Taibuns puissance facred and inviolable "in it felf should by their opposition & interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of & Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abolish and extinguish both "Dictator and Dictatorship. Which if it did, the posterity hereaster should lay the weight and "blame (although in vain) not in L. Papirius, but in the Tribuns, and in the perverie judgment & " of the people : when as the military discipline being once polluted and stained, neither fouldier "would obey the Centurions commandment, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonel the "Lieutenant, nor Lieutenant the Confuls, nor yet General of horse, the Dictator: whiles no man "hath regard and reverence either of men or of gods; no Edicts of Dictator, no flight of Birds "observed; but that without pasport, the souldiers may wander and rove, either in their own " ground or the enemies land, and unmindful of their facred military oath, may cashier and difcharge themselvs from souldiery, through a licentious liberty of their own, when oever they list;

" leaving their enligns and colours not attended, not meeting at fummons, not repairing to the " Rendezvous, according to proclamation : without all discretion, making no difference whether "they skirmish by day or night, on even ground or uneven, with advantage or disadvantage, with "direction, or without; observing no fignals and watchword no array. In sum, the whole course " of military fervice henceforth, blind, rash, and inconsiderate, after the guise of robbing, to stand 4 and go currant for folemn and facred warfare. With their crimes and abfurd inconveniences "(Oye Tribuns) charged you must be to the worlds end: lay down you must, and gage "your own lives for the audacious disobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now an-"iwerable. The Trib. were aftonied hereat, and for themselves now, rather careful and perplexed, B than for him who had recourse unto them for refuge and succor. But the general consent of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, ealed them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly belought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the General of horse, for their take. The Tribuns alfo, feeing that was the way, and all enclining and growing to Petition followed after, and did the like; earnestly beleeching the Dictator to forgive this human fragility, and youthful folly of Q. Fabius, faying, That he had suffered chastilement enough, Then the young man himself, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all strife, and laying aside debate, fell down at the Dictator his feet, and befought him to appeale his wrathful displeasure. Hereuponthe Dictator after filence made, "Yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this Ilike well, and thus it should be; now hath military dictipline got the victory, now hath the majesty of your Emof pireprevailed indeed, which lay both a bleed ng, and were in hazzard to have been abolified "and overthrown for ever, after this day, Q. Fabius is not acquit of his offence, in that he fought "against his foveraigns commandment: but being thereof convicted and cast, is forgiven nay, is "given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribuns power, whose affishance and help is granted "fortheir instant prayers, and not of duty. Well, Rife up Q. Fabius and live, a more happy man "for this agreement of the City in thy deien e, than for that victory, upon which erewhile thou "bareft thy selfe so bravely. Live (Isay) thou that hast been so bold to commit that fact, which "thine own father here, if he had been in L. Papirius his place, would never have pardoned. And "as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayst come again, at thine own will and pleasure: But "to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt perform "no greater duty and service than that the example of this days work may be a teaching and war-"ning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of superiour Ma-66 giltrates, After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horse, and discharged him of the Court, and was departed himself out of the common place of audience, the Senat joyiul and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one fide bidding joy to the General of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Dictator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no less confirmed and established by this peril and danger only of young Q Fabius, then by the late piteous execution of young Manlius.

By chance that year so fell out, that as often as the Dictator absented himself from the Army, E fo often the enemies role and raised troubles in Samnium. Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabim was ever in the eye of M. Valerim, Lientenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies wnatfoever. Infomuch, as when purveiours for corn being entrapped by an ambush were slain, in a place of difadvantage; commonly it was thought and beleeved that they might have been by the Lieutenant restued and saved, but for sear of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Distator lost the hearts of the fouldiers, who were already malecontent, for that he was so inexorable in the cause of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their instant intreaty, which afterwards he yeelded unto and pardoned, at the fuit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that he had left for the government of the City L. Papirtus Crassus the General of horse, discharged Q. Fabrus, and forbidden him to administer any thing by vertue of that office, returned into the camp. Whole coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own countrimen the fouldiers, nor yet fruck any terror in his enemies the Samnits. For, the next morrow, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were prefent or ablent, they approached the camp in order of battel. Howbeit, that one man, L. P. apirim the Dictator, was of such valor and importance, that if the love of the fouldiers had seconded the policy and fage conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnits had that day been quite dispatched and ended, past all peradventure , so skilfully set he the battel in array, so warily chose he his ground of advantage, fo strengthned he the same with supplies out of the reregard, in all warlike skil and fingular policy. But the fouldiers failed for their parts, and went coldly to 3 their business, even of purpose, that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be dis redited and depraved; and so the victory was much hindred and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnits were flain; and in exchange as many of the Romans hurt. But he like a wife and expert Captain, soon perceived, what was the cause that stayed the victory. He saw well enough, that he was to temper his own nature and to allay that severity of his, within mildness and courtefie. And herefore, taking with him the Lieutenants himself in person went about to visit the wounded foldiers, putting his head into their tents & cabbins asking each one how they did; charged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provost-Marthals, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look unto the fick fouldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it self popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity; that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptation of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encounted once again the enemy with affured hope of himfelf and his fouldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so discomfitted and put them to flight, that the Samnits after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them : and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor relitance. either in open shew, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the souldiers: so that their privat gain whet them on against their enemie, no leis then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnits tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrows, sued to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every fouldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithful protection, to his vertue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnits, the Dictator with triumph entred the City: and when he would have refigned up the Dictatorship, the Senat ordained, That before hegave over, he should create Confuls. So, C. Sulpitius Longus the second time, and Q. Emplius Caretanus were h elected.

The Samnits not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year. Which they objerved not faithfully: so soon were their stomacks up again to make war after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. Whiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Emylius (or Aulim as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the revolting of the Samnits, there arose a new war also from the Apulians. Both ways was there a power lent, Sulpitius his lot was to go against the Samnits, and Emplus against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no war was made, but contrariwife, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnits. Howbeit, the low effate of the Samnits, at that time, I hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed only the Apulian countrey, and Samnium was wasted : and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there hapned a scare by night, which raifed every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this fear.

The same year the Tusculans were judicially convented before the people of Rome by process, and that, by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribun of the Commons, exhibited a bill of Endichment to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tusculans; For that through their affiliance and Counsel, the Veliterns and Privernats had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tufculans with their wives and children reforted to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparrel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon, pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their cause to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, difanulled and made void the Endicument a forefaid. But the fentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death, Item, that their wives and children, by martial law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported, that N the Tufculans took to deep an anger against the authors of so hard a censure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe P. prria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius were Confuls, A. Cornelius Arvint Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambustus General of horse, having taken a straighter levy of souldiers then ordinary, for lear of a greater war in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) lead forth a goodly and puissant army against the Samnits. But they pitched their camp so carelesly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnit legions came on a sudden so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Corps of degard of the Romans. Howbeit the night approached so fast, that they were hindered for alfayling the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight neerer than he expected or hoped; for sear lest the straightness and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his souldiers, leaving fires thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the fight of the enemies, in the fill night with filence leadeth for h his legions: but yet could he not for the neerness of their camp elcape, but be espied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail.

and pressed hard upon the army in their march, yet in such fore, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not all iffued out of the camp before day light, At length when it was broad day, the Horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindred their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantery allo overtook the Gavalry, so as now the Samnits with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator feeing he could not go farther without his great loffe and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he flood " but, for asmuch as the light Horsemen of his enemies were overspred all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to cast a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor stay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and set his men in battel array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this most of all heartned and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occasion of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and straightness of the place, presumed that they did it upon fear; and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful ballance, albeit the Samnits now a long time had not been used to abide formich as the first shout of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is faid that the battail flood so equal and indifferent, that neither the shout and cry was redoubled, the clock in nor heard the second time, after it was once set up at the first buckling: nor the ensigns were set the morning; C forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they first were : nor yet of any part were until two after they seen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and preffing noon. with his shield, without breathing or looking back, still fought a-front the same noise, one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter wearines or dark night. Now began the strength of men to fail, now the spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and loie their force, and now the Captains themselves were to seek for counsel and what to do: By what time all at once the Samnits Horsemen, hearing that the cariages of the Romans with one only Corner were gone a good way off from the armed fouldiers, without any other guard and fortification ; for greediness of spoil set upon them. Which when a messenger in great hast and fear reported to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themselves with D the spoil, and spare not. Then came others one after another, windless with running, crying our and laying, that all was gone: and that every where the fouldiers goods were rifled, ranfacked and carried clean away. Whereupon he fent for the General of Horsemen, See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battel abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They stand still and are encumbred and peffred with our cariages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which usually hapneth to any multitude, busy in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) sew on Horseback, and asfew with weapon in hand: and whiles they are loding their Hories with spoil, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full dearly: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen; have you the honour of the Horse. mens service. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquisitly and skillully as possibly might be , ran forcibly upon the enemies disarraied and clogged with carriage , beating them down, and making a milerable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they cast from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and affraid, they were not able well, either to flie or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavalry were thus defeated and welneer all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horsemen, for to fetch a compais, fet upon the infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caused the hearts of the Samnits to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their enfigns out of order, and all their battailons waving and floting to and fro; called hard upon his fouldiers, and exhorted F them to fight luftily: cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals severally by name, to re-encharge and renew the battel again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shour, they advance the Standards, and fet forward the enfigns : and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in dilaray. And now by this time, the Horsemen also were within the fight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making fign with hand and with voyce as well as he could, shewed and made demonstration unto them, that they saw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemen. Which when they once heard, and saw withal; presently as if they had forgot the battel which they endured almost a whole day, and felt no smart of their wounds, they bestirred themselves against the enemy as lustily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, fresh G and in heart, and feen but now the fignal, and heard the found of trumper, to a battel. Now were the Samues no longer able to fultain the terror of the Horsemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either flain in the mids between, or scattered abroad in flight. Such as flayed and were environed about, the footmen flew: those who fled, were trodden under the Horie feet and killed: among whom, the Genetal himself left his body on the earth. This battel above all other, fo quelled and danned the hearts of the Samnits and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councels they multerered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they fped foill, in all their affairs of arms, the quarrel was so bad and ungodly, and the war be-H gun focontrary to a covenant of truce, and having the very Gods, and that justly, more against them and greater enemies than men: and that such a war must needs cost some great overthrow, and might not be expiat without fome notable fatisfaction. Here only was the difficulty and difference, whether vengeance and punishment should be taken of the guilty bloud of some few, or the guiltles bloud of all. And even then, some there were, that durst nominate the very authors of this war. And one specially, to wit, Brundus Papius, whose name was by the common voyce and consent heard above all the rest. A noble and mighty man he was, and without question, the principal breaker of this last truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done; at length decreed, That Brutulus Papius should be delivered to the I Romans, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their prisoners should be sent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and composition, the Fecialslaid claim, there should, according to right and equity, restitution be made. Then were the Heralds, by vertue of the decree, sent to Rome, together with the deads corps of Bruta-Ins: for hero avoid shame and punishment, wilfully killed himself. It was thought good, that with his body all his goods also, should be delivered. Howbeit none of all these things but only the captives, and what oever could justly be owned out of the booty, was received: all the reft were offered, but invain, for nothing was accepted. The Dictator by vertue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Confuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnits: and that Fabius also went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away I great and rich prizes. But without all controversie A. Cornel, was Dictator that year: this only was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Roman games [Circenfes,] (because L. Cantins hapned to be grievously sick) to give the signal when the chariots and fleeds should be let out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: and that having done that function of a charge (I wis not worth the remembrance) he should leave his Distators place, It is not an easy thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I suppose rather for my part, that the record and memorial of these matters hath been deprayed and corrupted, by these funeral Orations of praises, and by these counterfeit and false titles of images: whiles every house and family draweth to it, the honour and renown of noble exploits, martial seats, and dignities, by any untruth and lie, so it be colourable. And hereupon, surely it is, that both the l deeds of particular persons, and the publick records and monuments of Acts, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in those dayes, upon whom, as a true and cerrain author, we might ground, and rest our selves.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Ninth Book.

Titus Veturius and Sp. Posthumius Confuls, having engaged their army so far, within the Gullt or streight of Caudium, into a place of great disadvantage, that they had no means nor hope to set forth again, fell to capitulation with the Samnits, and compounded with them: and after they had dilivered unto them 600 Reman Horsemen for hostages, they went away with the rest of the army, but so as they were forced all of them to pass shamefully under the gallows. The same Consult (even by the N as they were jorden and of them, Sp. Posthumius, who per judded the Senat, that by rendring of those into the entermines hards, through whose default so shameful and ignominious a covenant was concluded, the City might be delivered and discharged of the promise given in the name thereof) with two Tribuns of the Commons, and as many besides as had subscribed to the foresaid accord and agreement, were sent and yeelded to the Samnits: but they might not be received. Not long after, Papirius surnamed Cursor, defeated the Samnits, and put them likewise under the gallows: and recovered again those 600 Roman Horsemen aforefaid, that were left for hostages. By which means, the shame and diffrace of the former beastly. All was cancelled and abolished. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Usentina and Falerina. New inhabitants were fent to people Suessa and Pontia. Ap. Claudius being Cenfor, brought a chanel of water to the City, called of his name Claudia : and paved the high way, named after him likewife, Appia. He Q admitted also into the range of Senators the sons of Libertins. But for a much as this state and degret of Citizens, seemed as it were polluted with these unworthy persons among them, the Consult of the year following, in the review of the Senators, and chusing new, held themselves to the order that other Census. next before had observed. This book conteineth moreover the prosperous wars against the Applians, Tof cans Umbrians, Marsans, Pelignians, Equians, and Samnits: with whom was renewed the ancient league and amity. Frer this year, immediately followed the peace made at Candium, to memorable for the Romans foil and misfortune, which hapned in the Consulthip of T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumius. During which, the Samnits had for their General Conducter, C. Postiges, the son of Herennius, a most prudent and politick father, and was himself a worthy warrior, and a most excellent Captain, This Pontius, after the Embassadors aforesaid (who had been fent to yeeld and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, fpake thus in a frequent affembly of the Samnits, and faid: "Mafters and friends, think never, The Oration that good there hath been done in this voyage, and our Embassage hath taken some effect. For of c. Pomius to 6 look what wrath the Gods in Heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant and the Saumits. "truce, is thereby wholly fatisfied, and fully done away. For what could possibly have been "done more, either to pacify the Gods, or to appeale men, than that which we offered and per-"formed? Whatfoever we won by way of hostility and spoil, from our enemies, and which by "right of war feemed to be ours, we fent back again: the counfellors and perswaders of taking "arms, because we could not send alive, we delivered dead as they were: and their very goods "allo (because nothing might remain with us, to bring us within the compass of their guiltiness) Have brought to Rome. What ow I more to thee Q Romand what am I bound to perform befides, in regard either of covenant, or of the Gods, she judges of the covenant? Whom shall I "chuie and sake for an indifferent arbitrator between thine anger and my punishment? No State

D "and body of people in general, no private person in particular do I resule: and if no equity and "teason for the poor and needy, be referved amongst men against the greater and more mighty, yet flie will I, and have recourse to the Gods , the Revengers of juch intolerable pride: and I will pray them to turn their anger upon thole, whom neither restitution of their own goods, nor the tendring of other mens withal to boot, will serve and content: whose fell cruelty, nei-"ther the death of the guilty persons, northe delivery of dead bodies, neither the owners them-" lelves yeelded, nor all they had in the World rendred with them, can satisfie: briefly, who may "not possibly be appealed, withour we should part with our heart bloud unto them, for to drink, and give our bowels and entrails to be torn in pieces. The war (O Samnits) is just and right on their behalf, who have no way and means to avoid it: and ever lawfully take they arms, who E "have no other hope, but in force of arms. Since then, in all the affairs of this World, nothing "is of more importance than this. That men weigh and confider, whether the Gods be gratious " or adverse unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as we made our former war not to much "against men as the Gods; so, we shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of Prophesie these words, (which as they were right pleasant and plausible in the hearing, for they proved as true and were verified in the fuccess entiting) he lead forth an army, into the field, and about Caudium he encamped himfelf, ascovertly as he could. From thence, he fendeth to * Calaria (where he heard that the * Gilazz* Roman Confuls and their forces lay in camp) ten fouldiers difguiled in the habit of Herdmen, and commanded them to keep their cattel grafing apart, some in one place and some in another, Four never far from the Romans forts and guards: with this instruction, That when they hapned upon any of the Romanforagers and vantcurriers, they should agree all in one tale, and say, That the Samnit legions were in Apulia, befieging Luceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by assault. This sumout also was oppurpose by others before, set abroad and spread yea, and came to the Romans ears: but these captives made it found more credible and like to becrue, for this especially, that all their words agreed one with another. No man doubted but that the Romans would aid the Lucerins, their good and faithful Allies, and the rather for fear left all Applia would upon this present trouble and searful example revolt, and band With the Samures and the only thing they flood upon was this, Which way to go unto them. For swain there mere leading to dineeria; the one, broad and open, along the coast of the Adria-Greek Sea: but as it was the lafer , fo it was the farther about. Another shorter cut there was through the Areights or gullet 106 * Candium called Furnita Candina. But the natural fituation of * Stretto de Arthe place is thus: There are two deep, narrow, and wooddy pases, or dales, one in the tail of the para or ill lago other, with communal creeks and ridges of hills round about them: between them lieth enclosed di S. Maria in the midit, a good large plain or meadow, green of grafs and full of waters, through the and Valle di midft whereof n there lierh a direct passage. But before ye come to that green , ye muli enter into that first freight aforesaid, and return again either the same way that ye went in , or if ye proceed to go forward, ye must pass through another such pass or streight, but narrower and more cumbersome than the other. Into that plain aforefaid the Romans marched down with H their army another way, through and hollow rock, but when they went on forth to the other fireight valley, they found it flopped and made up with the fall of trees, one crois over another, and likewife with an huge heap of mighty flones, laid full against them in the way. And they had not fo foon discovered this guilful practife of their enemies, but they might descry withal, a power of them also on the top of the Hill. Then with all speed they seek to go back again the same way they came; but it they found also dammed up in like fort, and beset with armed men. Whereupon they made a stand, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and aftonied, to their bodies allo were possessed as it were with a strange and extraordinary nummedness in their limmess: and whiles they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fel- I low to be more witty, and have better understanding than himielf; for a good while they stood fill, and faid not a word. But afterwards, when as they faw the two Confuls pavillions a ferting up, and some making ready things necessary to fortification; although they saw well enough, this up, and some making leasy times acceptany to for all the defences they could devile, they that in this desperate case, past all hope of recovery, for all the defences they could devile, they should but lose their time and travel and prove fools in the end: yet nevertheles, because they would not feem to encrease their diffressed fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, fetled himself to work, and to fortify along the water side their camp, with a trench and rampier. And besides the inforent and proud scotting and decision of their enemies, every manwith pittiful confession scorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpose. As the Consuls & then were pensive and discomforted, and called none about them to counsel, (for that indeed they supposed they were past all advise and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their lelves unient for, and the fouldiers turning to the Pratorium or Coniul. Quarter, cryed to their Captains for help and fuccour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than fat in fage council to give or take advise, until the night came upon them: whiles each man according to his natural humour and fancy, mottered diverily. "One faid, let us break through the Hoppinges opposed against us in the way: another, let us país over the mountains and "woods before us, what way loever we may be able to cary atmour; for lo we get to the en-"my once, whom we have almost for these thirty years vanquished and chased before us; all wills "be plain, even and caly unto us Romans fighting against these faithless, perjured, and disloyal "Samnits. Tuth, faith another, whither thould we go, or which way? What? Are we about to " remove mountains out of their places? So long as their tops of Hills are over our heads, how "will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed couragious or cowards, all is one, en-"trapped we are and undone every one. Our enemy will not to much as offer us the sword, se whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will fit fill and end this war. Thus passed words to and fro and thus passed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repatt, never thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnits on the other side, in this to fortunat and happy opportunity presented unto them, were as much to seek what to do, and what course to chuse and Whereupon, they all in general were to dispatch letters to Herennius Pontius, the fa-M ther of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reason of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but also all civil businesses: howbeit in that old crafy and spent body of his, he bare the fresh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give counfel. When he understood that the Romans army was shut up fast within the two forrests, at the Caudine Gulets, and that his advise was asked by his sons messenger: he gave presently this countel, That with all speed they should be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done urto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [of his ion and the army] his mind was demanded a second time, by the same currier sent again unto him of purpose. And then be gave advise, that they should be all killed, and not one left alive. Upon which answers so far disagreeing, and thus delivered, asit were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his son himself N imagined, of all others most, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his feeble walted body: yet by a general conient of all he was overcome; to fend for him in person for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, but was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and beeing called to counfel, he was in the same tale fill; so as he nothing changed of his former advise; but alleaged only canies and reasons thereof. "Namely, that in his former resolution (which he took to be simply the best) "his meaning was, by a fingular benefit and good turn, to confirm peace and amity for every "with a most mighty and puilfant people: in the second his purpose was, by the utterlose of "two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not easily recover their firength again, to defer "the wars for many a year. And as for a third counsel, he had none at all. When his fon and 0 other chief Caprains, by questioning inquired of him, what if a middle course between both were taken; namely to dimits them fale, and according to the Law of arms and conquest to impose upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? "Mary (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that "neither winneth you friends, nor yet riddeth you of your foes: fave them whom ye have pro-" voked with shame and disgrace; and see what yeget thereby. The Romans are of this nature, "that they cannot be still and quiet so long as they have the worle; it will never dye in their " hearts but wil be alwayes fresh whatsoever shame this present extremity shall brand them with

A "and never will it give them any rest, before they have been by manifold and fundry wayes reven-"ged of you. So his advise was not accepted, neither the one nor the other, and old Herennius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewife in the camp, after many attempts' (but all in vain) for to break forth and escape away, being now in great penuty and icarriyot all things, for very necessity: were driven to send Embassadors unto the enemies: who sait should crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battel. Pontius made answer, that there was no talking of battel; for that the field was won already: and because they being vanquished, and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confess their poor efface; he gave them to underflatd. That he would put them under the gallows, despoiled of their armour, and stript into their shirts: and as R for other conditions of peace, they should be such, as were meet to pass between men conquered, and conquerours : namely, if they would depart out of the Samnits country, withdraw their colonies, and so both Samnit and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and customes: uponthele Articles and Capitulations, he was content to come to fome point of accord with the Consuls. If any of these covenants disliked them, then he forbad the Embassadors to repair again to him any more, but at their peril. When relation of this answer was made in the camp, there arose juddenly such a sighing and groning amongst them all, and so great pensiveness and anguish of heart feized upon them, that it feemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the heart, if word had been brought that they must all have died in the place. After long filence, when as the Consuls wist not how to open their mouth, either for the accord and composition C so shameful, or against it so necessary: then L. Lentulus, who as well in regard of his vertue, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutenants, faid: "I have heard my father (quoth he) Oye "Confuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who persuaded the "Senar, not to ransome and redeem with gold, the City from the hands of the Gauls; at what "time as they were not inclosed either with trench or rampier by their enemies, (a Nation to "fay a'truth, of all others most idle in such works, and forcifications) but might have broken "through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and affired deftruction, "Were the cafe so now that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol upon their enemies under them (in which fort oftentimes the belieged have fallied out upon "them that lay in fiege) so we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it skilleth not) D " good or bad even or uneven: I would not in giving counsel be any jot behind my father in cou-"rage and valor. For I confess verily that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my own " part, ready am I even to offer my body as a facrifice to prefent death, yea, and it were, to engage "my selfamong the thickest of my enemies, thereby to lave the people of Rome and the legions: " But alas, here I see my country, here I see all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who "unless for their own selves they will run upon their death, what have they else to save by their "death ?-Why, will some mansay, the houses and buildings of the City, the walls, and that mul-"titude that inhabit the City. Nay rather, if this army fortune here to miscarry, they are all clean "betrayed into the enemies hand and not faved. For who shall defend them? Peradventure, the " weak and unarmed multitude: even as well furely as they defended it against the violence of the E "Gaulse Or, will they fend for an army from Veii, and beleech the help again of Captain Camillus? " Even the one as well as the other, But here in this place is our whole hope, here is all our power "and pullance: in faving it, we preserve our country; in offering it to die, we abandon and betray "our country. To yeeld and render our selves, is a foul and shameful thing; true, but such is "the love of our Country, that we ought to preserve it, as well with our utter shame, if need re-" quire, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this shameful indignity whatsoever, " and obey that fatal necessity, which the very Gods themselves cannot overcome. Go to then, "Consuis, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons, which your fore-fa-"thers ransomed with their gold. Then went the Consuls to Pontius for to patle. And when as he began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly F that any league could be made, without the privity, will and authority of the whole people: nor without the Fecials, and other folemn and usual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudius also writeth) concluded by form of absolute covenant, but by way of stipulation and promise. For what needed either sureties in a persect agreement and league, or hostages to be given when the matter is passed by this form of prayer, By whose default it hepsed that the conditions agreed were not o' served, that people Jupiter would so since there was by the secial smitten? The Cost. Lieutenants, Treasurers, and Colonels, who undertook as furcties, subscribed and signed; and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had passed by way of an absolute league, there should have been subscribed no more but the names of two Fecials only. Moreover, by reason that the conclusion of G this accord was of necessity deserred, there were required also 600 Horsemen hod ages, who should lose their heads, in case the covenants of the agreement were not observed. And thereupon was the time appointed and fet down of delivering the faid hostages, and yeelding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Contuls renewed again the forrow in the camp, that hardly they could hold their hands from those, through whose rash conduct they were come to that place of disadvantage: and through whose cowardise they were to depart from thence more shamefully than they came: complaining that they had not so much as a guide to direct them, nor an eipial to discover the coasts : but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or H pitfal: and one looked upon another; beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon (hould be unarmed), their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They fee before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the (cornes and reproachful taunts of the Victor, his proud and didainful looks, and how they (difarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful difmarch of their digraced army: briefly, their foul and difhonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of r weapon, without battel fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not fo much as draw their (word, and never came to joyn or encounter with their enemy; having armour, having frength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontenument and anguish, these words, the satal hour of their reproach and shame was come; which by proof and lenfible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench difarmed, and in their fingle garments: then were the hoftages prefently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Serjeants and Officers willed to depart from the Confuls: whose rich coars of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compaffion even in them, who a while before with all curfing and banning, judged them worthy K to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled despiteously and cut in pieces : that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood turned away his eyes, as it were from an abhominable (pectacle, and could not indure to behold that dilgracing and disfiguring of fo great state and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coss, welneer half naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor flood al the while about them forming mocking, and making a game of them: many had fwords and daggers fet against their hearts, in menacing wife, some were hurt and stabled to death; namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they fent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was L more grievous than the thing even in the fight and view of their enemies, they were not fo foon got out of the forreft, but although they feemed but then as plucked out of dark hel to fee the day, yet the very light it felf was worfe than al kind of deaths, when they beheld fo illfavoured an army and unfeemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulnes and protection of their allies, or elfe dimated for very shame, they cast their poor and filly bodies upon the ground, about the high wayes not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just and due pitty which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogancy and pride of that people by kind, Immediatly they sent unto the Coss the ensigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Lictors and Serjeants with their rods, they fent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the souldiers bountifully and as they came neer M to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindness and hospitality, both privat and publick, that could be devised, and as meet was and requifite. And yet neither the courteous usage, nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor fo much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yeelded them al these comforts they could, So as, besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain bashfulness and shame forced them to shun all communication and converting with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been fent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confins; they were fent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news: they reported, that they N feemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so filent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and mum, their hearts clean done and gone together with their armor, not able to greet again, no, nor to give a word to those that saluted them, not one of them for tear able to open his mouth, as if fill they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnits had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, floutnels, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such affent, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperat; and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful consederats, that o they were past recovery; one Offlim Celavim, the son of Ovins, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age. spake by report in this manner and faid, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolut filence, (qd. he) those eyes fastened so wistly on the earth, those deaf ears to admit al solace and comfort, that thame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were express and certain tokens of them that toffed and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart, a huge heap and mass of anger & despite, Either (qd.he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that stilness & slence will shortly cost the Sampies, woful cryes and doleful groans: and the remembrance of this Caudium accord, wil be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnits than to the Romans : for, as for them, they wil every man find their hearts and courages again, wherefoever they shal hap to encounter but the Samnits shal not meet every where with the Candium streights for their purpose; And now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome. Intelligence they, had before, how they were belet and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a meflenger with news more heavy and for rowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger otherwise. At the first noise and bruit that they were besieged, they began to muster; but after they heard, that they had to thamefully yeelded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succor R was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publick authority, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were that up. A general vacation began of it felf, and pleading in all courts ceafed, before Proclamation made: the purple and fearlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid a way, and the whole City in a manner more forrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautions and inferties for the same; but hated also the guiltless souldiers; denying staty, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which heat of stomack and wrathful indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly allayd; which even to angry persons was pitiful and lamentable. For they returned not as men that escaped safe, alive, and unlooked for into their country, C but like captives in habit and countenance; they entred late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own house: so as the morrow after, and for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to look into the fireets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which thy were forced unto by an act of the Senat; namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambustus for Dictator, and P. Elius Parus, General of Horse. Who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auspices, there were chosen in their room, M. Emplius Pappus for Dictator, and L. Valerius Flaceus General of the Horsemen, and yet by them was nor the affembly holden for the Election abovefaid. And for asmuch as the people were even weary D again of all that years Magistrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interreign. So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Confuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Papirius Curfor the second time: with the whole consent, no doubt, of the City, for that in those dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found, These same day they were created, they entred their Magistracy (for so the LL. of the Councel had decreed:) and after certain folemn and ordinary acts of the Senat passed, they went in hand to consult about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whose course it was then to have the foveraignty of rule; "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded; The Oration and let us hear your opinion, and what you can fay. Who after he was rifen and stood up, of Sp. Posthumia. Who after he was rifen and stood up, of Sp. Posthumia. Who after he was rifen and stood up, of Sp. Posthumia. Who after he was rifen and stood up, of Sp. Posthumia. Who after he was rifen and stood up, of Sp. Posthumia. "O ye Confuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but to my diffrace; and in the Senat, commanded to ipeak, not as a Senator and Counceller, but as a man culpable and accused, both for an unfortunate war administred, and a shameful peace concluded. Howbeit, seeing that "ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our trespass or our punishment, ((letting apart all kind of excuse and desence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, "before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, whereto men may be "driven) I will in briefdeliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propoun-"ded, Which septence of mine may sufficiently witness and testify, whether I meant to spare mine "own life, or fave your legions, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necessary (tipula-F "tion and promife, call it whether ye will. And yet, feeing it was made without the peoples pri-"vity and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Samnits, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Feciales and "Heralds, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all scruple and trouble "of conscience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no let in Law of God or man, "but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and "advice is, that the Confuls levy, enrol, arme, and lead forth anarmy: but not to enter within "the enemies marches, before all things duly belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and befeech ye, O immortal Gods, that feeing it was not your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Possibnmin and T. Verurin Consult, should with fortunate G "conduct fight against the Samnits, yet ye would be satisfied herewith. That ye beheld us put un-"der the gallows: that ye saw us obliged in an infamous and shameful bond of covenant: that "ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands, ready to receive upon our " heads even with the loss of our lives, al their anger, malice, and delpight and that it would please " you that the new Confuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that fort war with the Samnits, "as evermore the wars before us Confuls have been conducted, managed and performed. When he had spoken these words, all men both so wondred at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the same Sp. Post humius, who had moved and perswaded so foul and diffionest a treaty of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that so brave and noble a per-H fonage, should suffer any especial torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reverting and breach of that accord. When as now they all after fingular praises of the man, condeirended to his opinion; the Triburs of the Com. L. Livius and Q. Melius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be while to oppose themselves again restored to acquit and associated in conscience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again restored to "the Samnits, in the same estate wherein they flood at Candium: nor they themselves (in that they 4 fubicribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to fave the holt of the people of Rome) "had deserved any punishment: nor yet, last of all, ought they being sacred Migistrats and in-" violable, to be yeelded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth " Postburitus) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with fafe 1 "confcience and without offence ye may. And as for thefe, to facto-fainet as they now be, ye "Thall hereafter render them likewife, lo foon as they are out of their charge. But if ye will be ru-«led by me, let them before they be thus yeelded, here in this common Hal be whipped and four-"ged for the usury and interest of their punishment, which they would feem to defer and put of follong. For whereas they alledge and say, That by the delivery and yeelding of us, the peoples conficiences cannot be cleered and affoiled; who is so ignorant in the Feciales and Heralds law, " that knoweth not that these men spake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not "be rendred, than for that the truth requireth fo. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare pro-"miles and flipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with *those men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and K "effimation: but I deny again, that without the peoples affent and grant, any thing can be effabilified good and effectual, to bind the people thereunto. What I if the Samnits, in the same pride and infolency, wherein they obtruded and forced upon us this flipulation, yea, and wrung is from us, would also have urged us to utter and speak, the solemn form of words, which they " ine to do that surrender up Cities; would ye (my Masters that are Tribuns) infer and say, that "by vertue thereof the people of Rome is furrendred into their hands? and that this City, with the 4 Temples, Chappels, Limits and Waters, by strength thereof, are the Samuits possession? Well, I "let pais to speak of dedition, because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation, « What, I pray you if we had promifed and undertook, that the people of Rome should for lake s and abandon this City? or fetfire on it? or not have Magistrats, Senat, or laws any longer? or L to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, fay you, Well, it is not the indignity of things, that easeth the bond of Stipulation, If there be any one case, wherein the people may "he obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat hap-6 ly some will make a stay, and think it is material) whether Consul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter es into bond and become surety. And even this it was, that the Samnits themselves judged so to 66 be, and stood upon thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the "Lieutenants the Treaturers, and the Colonels there, to the same, And now, let no man demand of me, why I entred to into flipulation, being a thing not incident to the Conful his charge and stright, neither was I to undertakeunto them peace, which was not in my power to effect nor in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certainly my Lords N and Senators, there was nothing at Candium done at all by mans policy and counsel. The im-"mortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their fense and understanst ding; for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our " good guard: and they again, as they gat the victory full badly, so they loft it as lewely: whiles "they hardly trufted the firength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage "and better hand of us: and while they made fuch haft, upon what agreement they cared not, to "difarm menthat are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their " right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they fent for old aged men from "their home, to come to Councel, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and io to "have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and final league indeed." "It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbred, but lightly appointed. All that "mean while there might have been truce until the Embassadors from Rome, had brought them "either certain victory or affired peace. For that had been a covenant and flipulation goodin "law, the which we should have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples will and approbation "But ye would never have granted and allowed it : no more should we have entred into any such "Aipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there should be any other issue and end of things than this: that both they should vainly be deluded and feed themselves as it were, With the fancy of a more joylit dream than their minds could wel conceive and apprehendand "also that the same fortune which had entangled, finared and brought into danger our army, " should relieve the same and rid it again out of perilthat as their victory was frivolous and vain, 0 " fo a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make it stuffrat and worth nothing; and that such a "Ripulation and promife should be interposed and come between, which might oblige and bind "no perion, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords " of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into que "flion? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Citizen? To "enemy ye have passed no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye com-

"commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave nought in charge: and with the Samnits as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the Samnits, we are infiltient pledges enough, and aniwerable to perform that which is our own: "for that, I fay, which we are able to make good and yeeld: even our bodies and lives: upon thefe then exercife their rage, upon thefe let them whet their fivords and their fpightful "malice. And as forthe Tribuns of Commons, confult ye together, whether they may be rendered and prefently, or ought to be referved and put off to an other day: let us in the mean time (O "Vessrins, and ye that are the reft) offer thefe wretched heads and lives of ours, like caytives to dilicharge our bond, and by our punishment and execution, deliver and let free the Roman

Both the cause it self, and the Advocatalso, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribuns themselves [of Commons] that they promiled to be at the Confuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediatly they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Fecials hands with the other, to be led all, to Candium. There was not so soon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light and saves of the Sun shone upon the City again. Pefthumius was in every man his mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens : comparing him with the voluntary offering of P. Decive the Conful, for the fafety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a fervil, dishonourable and un-Chonelt peace: He (fay they) hath offered himself to al the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full fatisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war: Alarm, now cryed every man: and, oh, that everthey might fee the day to encounter on e again with the Samnits, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whiles the City was thus inflamed and boiled with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Volumaries. New legions were multred and enrolled again out of the lame fouldiers, and a puilfant atmy fet forth to Caudium. The Fecials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Sureties, such as had subscribed and signed the accord aforestaid, to be despoiled and stript out of their cloths, and their hands to be pinnioned behind him. And when the Lictor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majesty in Posthumius his person, bound him D at large and at ease, Why doeft not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord streighter, that the sendring and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into the affembly of the Samnits, and before the Tribunal judgment feat of Pontius; A. Cornelius Arvina one of the Fecials or Heralds thus spake: For almuch as these persons, without commandment and commission from the Quirites and people of Rome, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you; and in to doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rôme might be freed and associated from a decutable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yeeld unto you, the felf same men. No sooner had he uttered these words, but Posthumius with his knee smote the Fecial his high, with all the might he could : and with a loud E voycefaid, That he being now a Samnit citizen, and the other an Embassador and an Herald of the people of Rome; had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abuse: whereby the Romans might more infilly make war. Then quoth Ponting. "This delivery nei-ther will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnits hold it good and lawful. But why "dost not thou Sp. Posthumius, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or "stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnits, whom "they once had in their power; or elie peace, in lieu of them. But why ipeak I thus, and chal-"lengethee, who doef yeeld thy leli again priloner to the conqueror as faithfully and loially as "thou canft? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promite and bargain made at the fireights of Candium, let them bring again the Legions into that gullet, wherein F" they were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all "beundone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour, which by cove-" nant they yeelded up: let them return into their own camp, and have what foever they had the "day before the Parle. Then let them please themselves with war, with valiant and magnanimous "deeds: refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace. Let us "have the same fortune, the same opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before "the mention of peace: and to make war, and trie the iffue. So shall neither the people of "Rome, blame the Confuls flipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the people of Rome. And will ye never have done, but alwayes find shifts and excuses, and not fland to your covenants. when ye are overcome, and have the worfe of your enemies? Ye gave G "fometimes hoftages to King Porfena; and when ye had done, afterwards flole them away. For "a fum of gold you bought again your City of the Gauls; and as they were receiving the same "gold, murdered they were by you and hewn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon "condition that we should restore again your legions unto you; that peace you cancel and make "void, and evermore ye fet some colour of right upon your cautelons and fraudulent dealing: Well, " alloweth not the people of Rome of the faving of their Legions, by a dishonorable and shameful "peace? Say it is fo, Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions Captivat. Is this your faithful dealing are these your covenants, & ceremonies of Fecials & He"ralds? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, shoulds have that defire of thine, H "even io many citizens lives laved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go un-"to thee an enemy) I bargained for? What Justice is this, that thou, O Correlius, and ye that are "heraids, prefiribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of those perions whom heraids, prefiribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of those perions whom ye make a shew to deliver, neither can I believe, that they are yeelded in verity and good earnest, ye make a shew to deliver, neither can I believe, that they are yeelded in verity and good earnest, "Nay, I pais not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a covenant "made, attended upon with the wrath and dipleasure of all the Gods, whole heavenly power "and deity is thus de uded. Now go and make war, feeing that Sp. Postbumine erewhile thrust and puthed an Embassador herald with his knee; and so the Gods will believe no doubt, that c: P. filmmine is a Simnit citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnit, a Roman Embafiador hath I "been abused: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarrel to make war upon "upon us. Are you not lishamed, and bath you not to broach and set abroad, in the view and "face of the world, fuch mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave personages, and "fuch as have been Confuls', to feek fuch fubrie devices (not fit for very children and babesto "play with) and all to shift off and falsity their promise made by covenant. Go Lictor, loose the "Romans of their bands: and no man io hardy as to flay them, but that they may depart when "they will at their own pleasure. So they, having thus perhaps discharged the publick fidelity, " or at least wife quit themselves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to

The Samnits feeing that in lieu of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a most cruel wark new forung up again, not only forecast and apprehended in their minds, but well neer saw evidently with their eyes, all that ever enfued after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wor, they praifed the two-fold counfel of old Pontine : and how they taking the middle way between, were deseived & had exchanged the certain possession of victory for an uncertain and doubtful peace and having loft the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hurtful enemies, or made their fast and assured friends forever. And so without any weakning of their power and forces of either side by battel, their hearts after this Candine peace were to changed, that Posthumius by his voluntary yeelding was more honored among the Romans, than Pontius his bloodless victory among the Samnits: and the Romans made this reckoning, that I the possibility of making war was to them asmuch as undoubted victory : and the Samnits believed verily, that the Romans had at once made war again and got the upper-

Whiles these things thus passed, the Satricans revolted to the Samnits : and the Colony at Fregena, by the fudden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnits (with whom it is certain the Satricans were binded) in the night was surprised and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, kept them in on both fides that they firred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yet, for that the Fregellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they lay) and by reason that the multitude, unmeet for arms, flood them in good flead in annoying their enemies from off their houses; they held out and M found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wily and deceitful policy turned all backwards and was their undoing: for they suffred the voyce of the cryer to be heard through the Town, who proclaimed. That who oever laid down weapon, should depart alive and safe with bag and baggage. The hope whereof, caused them to slack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to call away their armor in every place. But the resolut fort armed still, brake away through a postern gate, whose venturousness proved to them more safe, than the inconsiderat lear of the other which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Samnits compafied them about with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help, and to their enemies for performance of their promise, yet they burned them most piteously.

The Con uls parted between themselves, their Provinces. Papprius took his way to Luceria in N Apulia, where the Roman Hotlemen given for hostages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publinu stayed in Samnium to make head against the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and diftracted the minds of the Samnits: for neither their hearts would serve them to go to Luceria, left the enemy should come on their backs; not yet to stay behind, for fear left in the while, Luceria should be lost. They thought it best therefore, to put all in hazard of a battel, and to try it out with Publius. Whereupon, they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publius was minded to joyn in fight, he thought it not amils, first to make some speech unto his men, ard focommanded them to affemble unto an audience. But, as they came running to the Pretorium, with exceeding great cheerfulnes, so by reason of their noise that called hard for battel, 20 exhortation of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mindful of the former dif- 0, grace, served well enough to encourage and animat them. So they march out to battel, putting forward the standard-bearers and post-enigns. And because they would lose no time, they first charge with lancing their javelins and shooting darts, and after that, in drawing their swords, they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a fignal given them fo to do, and with naked drawnsword, they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to be shewed of warlike Captain, no skill to be shewed either in setting in array the files and ranks, or placing of the rereward for supplies: the souldiers surious anger, with raging violence, marshalled and managed all,

A So, the enemies were not only discomfitted and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the haft they could, disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and so came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battel; entred also into their camp: where was more bloudshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their choler marred and clean loft.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Coff, marched along the Sea coast to Arp: and all the Country they passed thorow, shewed them friendship and courtese, more for the outrages and loss sustained by the Samnits, and the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people B of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Sampus at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountainers and wild people, and as it is commonly feen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, wasted the plain Champian and Sea coasts, despiting indeed their more civil life and convertation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Samnits, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arps, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have confumed them, being cut offfrom all provision of victuals. For even then, being gone from them, and lying encamped before Luceria, as wel they with-out in the leaguer & those that were within the City befreged, were nipped and bitten with hunger. The Romans were served all from Arpi, but so slenderly and scantly, that whiles the sootmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working unceffantly; the Horsemen, were fain to bring corn from Arpi, in little leather baggs: and otherwhiles, if they met the enemy, were forced to cast the corn from off their Horlebacks, to fight more nimbly. They that were within befieged before the other Conful came with his army, had both from the mountains of the Samnits, victuals brought unto them, and fuccors also of men les in to them. But the coming of Preblins made all provisions more fireight: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Coniul, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and io beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnits, feeing that they within the City befieged, were past all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Papirias battel. At which very inflant, when they were on both fides preparing to fight, the Tarentin Embassadors came between, discharging and forbidding, both Samnits and Romans to fight professing withal, that whosever, they were that resuled to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others. Papirius having heard that embaffage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Conful; and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to fight, when he had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already refolved, he prefently gave the fignal, and fet out the bloudy banner of battel. Now as the Confuls were bufy in facrificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors aforesaid, encountred them and expected an answer. To whom Papirius, The Chick-master (qd. he) O ye Tarentins, sendeth me word, that the birds seed right, and all is well; and befides that, the Gods in our facrifice feem passing well pleased. And in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to battel. Then commanded he to fet forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the foolish nation for their great vanity, who, not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnits on the other fide, having flaked all their care and defire of war, for that they defired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to win unto them the Tarentins; seeing the Romans all of a sudden arranged in battel array and ready to fight, cryed forth aloud, that they rested still in the authority of the Tarentins, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, norput themselves in Farms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatfoever, than to feem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Coss.) we take that for a good sign and presage of lucky success: and we would wish no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to desend their trench and rampire. So the Cost, when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and fet upon them with an hor affault on every fide. Thus while some filled and dammed up the trenches, others plucked up the stakes of the rampier, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their seet: whiles not only their own inbred valour by nature, but also anger and choler provoked and pricked to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankred at the very root, for the last diffrace received, they Gentred the camp. Every man for his part gave out and faid, Here are not the straight gullets of Caudium, here are not the impassable nor inaccessible passes, and forrests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their filly errour and want of forecast: but Roman vertue and prowels, which no rampier never fo strong, no trench how deep soever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made refiftance and flood to it, as those that retired and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beaft, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Confuls founded the retreat, and with minatory words commanded the fouldiers, so greedy of murder and bloudthirfly, to go forth of the camp Whereupon when they were highly discontented and ingreat indignation, for that they were flaid and interrupted in this sweetness of easing their anger, and satisfying their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the souldiers were given to underfland, how the Confuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter: but as they were their chief conductors to the war, so they would be their leaders and shew them the waysto aniatiable appetite of revenge and execution, had not the care and regard of those 600 Horsemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, cooled their thins and flaid their flomacks; left haply the enemies in despair to find pardon and mercy, should run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the fword; thing rather to tormen and kill them first, before they died themselves. The fouldiers greatly commended this course, and rejoyced that thus their choler was allaid, and their fury bridled, confessing. That they were indeed to abide all what loever, rather than the life of lo many of the forwardest and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, should be betraid, or in danger. This audience being dismissed, they drew together to a Councel, whether with all their forces they should affair and press hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to found the Apulans, a close and secret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had stood in doubtful terms

Publiss the Conful, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and with them. expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obellance certain States, or upon conditions entred league and fociety with them. Papprins also, who staid at the siege of Luceria, with E in a frost time sped according to his expectation. For having forelaid and befet all the wayes,by which victual was conveyed thither out of Samnium, the Samnits who lay in garifon at Lucrus, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Roman Consul, making offer to release and deliver up into his hands those Horsemen, (the only cause of the present war) in case he would raife and levy the fiege. To whom Paprius made this answer that they should have gone fift to Pontius, the ion of Herennius, by whole counfel they had put the Romans under the yole and the gallows, to learn and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquithed and overcome. Howbeit, for almuch as they had rather, and chole rather to becenfured indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own felves, he willed the Embassadors to give them to understend in Luceria, that they should leave their ard wincuture Emparated and baggage, their beafts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the wars, within in the wals. And as for the fighting fouldiers, he would put them to pais under the gallows in their fingle shirts, for to revenge the shame first offered them, and not to inflict any new ignominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refused: seven thousand men of war were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raifed within Luceria, all their own enfigns and armorregained, which they had lott at Candium: and that which furmounted all other joyes, they reco gameu, which the Centlemen of arms, whom, lying for pledges and fecurity of the peace aforefaid, vered again those Centlemen of arms, whom, lying for pledges and fecurity of the peace aforefaid, vered again those Centralities at the kept in lafe cuflody. There is not lightly to be found a vi-Gory more noble, and of greater confequence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the fud den change of fortune, in case (as some records bear witness) Pontim also himself the son of Ho. rennius, and General of the Samnits, to make fatisfaction and quittance for the Confuls diffrace and shame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But I less marvel, that it is not clear, but left uncertain, that the enemies General was rendred, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papirius Curfus, General of the Horsemen, managed these acts first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Lucria! and being the only revenger of that diffrace of the Romans, triumphed most worthily (I dare be bold to lay) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus: or whether the chief honour hereof pertain by right to Papirius as Conful. Upon this error followeth another in the met of it, whether Papirius, furnamed Curfer, for his good fervice at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracy, and were made the third time Conful with Q. Empliss Caretanus, the ic. cond time: or whether it were L. Papyrins Mugillanus, and the error grew upon the surname, But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the wars, were performed and finished by Consuls. Emplies in one prosperous battel made a final conquest of the Ferentans, and upon composition had the City delivered up unto him, whither they had reind their forces for fuccor after their defeat in the field, and holiages were imposed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consul with the Satricans, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Sampits, after the loss at Caudium, and had received into their City a garrifon of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the walls of Savieum, and that their tizens within a aree Embassadors sent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy answer from the Conful, That unless they would kill the garrison of the Sam 0 nits, or deliver them into his hands, they should come no more again to him: the Coloners and inhabitants were more frighted and terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army, Whereupon the Embassadors followed their suit hard and continued still, demanding very often of the Conful how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and diamed, should be able to force a garriton fo strong and wel appointed against their wills? being will do ask counsel of them, by whose means they had received the said garrison into the Town, they deA parted their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands, to confult with their Senate and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two factions, which durracted and heid them in suspence that they could not soon resolve. The one consisting of the thief personages and head men, who had sollicited them to revolt from the people of Rome; the other of true hearted and loyal Citizens. Howbeit, both fides strove in the end and endeavored to labour the Conful for reconciliation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnits garrison having not provision enough aforehand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Contul, what hour of the night, through what gate the enemies would go forth, and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whose will B they were revolted to the Samnits, the very same night, opened another gate besides to the Con-

ful, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold complot of treason, they were surprised unawares and all their throats cut not only the garrison of the Samnits (by rea on that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and befet) but also at one initiant there was a shout and allarm raised by the enemies within the City, which was full of them and thus in the space of one hour both the Samnits were slain, the Satricans taken, and all they had in the world leiled into the hands of the Conful: who after diligent inquifition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guilty, those he scourged and beheaded: and letting there a frong garrison, he took from the Satricans all their armout. From thence

Papprim Curfor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that fay, by his leading Luceria C was recovered, and the Samnits put under the yoke.) And without question, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warriour, surpassing not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body and namely, for his good soot manship : whereupon he got his furname * Curfor. For in running (they fay) he had not his peer but went away with * An excelprick and prize before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and lent runner. ftrong conflicution, or his much exercise, a front and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally to his meat, and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so tough metall and seel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travell what soever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary toil and labour; yes marry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no easement at all, I will ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to firoke their shoulders, back and buttocks. He was a man besides for severity straight, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Prator of Preneste, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slack in bringing forward the rereward, into the vangard and from of the battel: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the fer jeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Prenestin stood amazed and well near dead, Difspatch Lictor (quoth he) stock me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he law him aftonied and his heart in his heels for fear of death, he fet a good round fine E upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitfull for vertue and valour) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome refled and relied more: Infomuch as men had deftined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Afa, he should have bent his power hither, and warred in Europe.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing less fought, ever fince I began this work, than A digreffion to digrefs and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by to a discourse extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to seek for the of comparison readers pleasant starts and diverticles to repose themselves, and for my self some case and recreation of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to and the Rothink upon, and to utter abroad the fecret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and mare. coffed in my mind : and which induce me now to learth and examin willingly, what event would have hapned and befaln to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander. First and formost, the things that feem to bear tway and prevail in war, be these (to wit) number of souldiers, valour, and courage withall, wit, tufficiency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and lastly fortune, which as in all other humane and world y affairs beareth a great stroke, so in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prove that the Roman Empire and government had flood as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first, to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves; I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and fingular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and re-G nown that he was a fole commander of himself that he was a young man and died in the growth of his prosperous affairs, before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let pass other otherglorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirrours and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnificabove all other, as also of late time, Pompey the great, to disfavor & the turning wheel offertune, but only this, that they lived long? Let me but reheatle and teckon up the Roman captains; and those not all, nor in every age, wherein they sourished; but even them only, with whom being

Corvinus, C. Martius Rutdius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquasus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papirius Cur-H for, Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decis, L. Volumnius, M. Curius: Besides other brave men and vali-ant personages that followed after in case he had sought the Carthaginian were sinst (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then passed over into Isaly, when he had been well stept in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towardness of nature, as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and construed by experiments. For to after one courie the Kings conducted their wars : even fo, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) so, consequently the Fabii, the Quinii, I and Cornelii: fo did Furius Camillus whom those two Romans in their youth (Manlius Torquans and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountred, saw an aged man in the latter end of his daies, And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battel, and performed all Military duties with other fouldiers, (which was not the least part of his praise & glory) would Manlius Torquains have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout souldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papirius Curfor have given him way, a man of that incomparable frength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been over K wrought with the stratagems & policies of that one young man? which, who oever he was that faid, it confifted and was compoled altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat Mary, here was all the doubt (forfooth) lest that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a Camp in, more wisely & tett that he above for the control account and the provision for vicinal, to force the beware cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for vicinal, to force be beware of ambufhes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battel, to fet his battaillons in array, and to ftrengthen the fame with sufficient succours & supplies from the reregard, Snrely, he would have faid himself, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakned and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for fhew and oftentation of his wealthy and superfluous for L tune, Alexander without any bloudfned, with doing nought elie, but knowing well how to contemn fach toies and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior, He would have thought verily that the scituation and nature of Italy far differed from that of Indiasthrough which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army, seafting and banquetting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forrests and unpassable straights of Apulia, the high hils and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the loss that hapned in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus milerably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity i wherein no man had ever less rule of himself than he. Whom if we confider, as he was arraied in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may fo fay) of a new M nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured; surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a bastard army with him, nothing at all refembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieveth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of hisappareshis excessive vain-gloty and desire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner by men lying upon the earth groveling and profirst at his feet, Such abject baseness should have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerours as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deferving friends, even in the midft of his cups and N dainty viands: last of all his vanity his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkennels and unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for Ireport nothing but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes, and wondrous hindrances, to the vertues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge, even the vainett persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in comparison of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majefty and name of Alexander the great (And I think verily that even themselves that talk so much of him neverheard the truth, so much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Athens, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might fee before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Orators durth freely make publike invectives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much foever the grandeur and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that shall be but one only man, rising, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years,

A Which happiness of his, they that extol in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battels had the foile and lost the day: whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little understand they, that compare the exploits of one person, and him a young man, with the the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvell, it when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should vary more, than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of R day-books and, journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and selicity the people of Rome had never cause to repent of and be discontented for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten ortwenty daies; and none the Consulship longer than a year. Their levies and musters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and best time for war other whiles overslipped them, and yet they went forth. Before their term expired, they were often called home for to be prefidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconfiderate rashnets one while, and the prevish crookedness another while of a Collegue and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They succeeded fundry c times after the lois and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained fouldiers or fuch as were in ill discipline trained up: whereas Kings and Monarchs contrariwife, not only freed and exempt from all luch obstacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and Mafters, and of absolute command over their enterprises over times and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others draw all after them to their advice and counsel, and are themselves directed and over-ruled by none, Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with these Capgains as invincible as himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of forrune as any of them; nay tather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy; in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also exposing himself to many perillous chances: but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, either for glory Dorgreatness of their worthy deeds : who every one should have lived and died according to the fatal course of his own several destiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of fouldiers or multirude of Allies from whom they had their aids. There were eftermed by computation in the Taxing years, and Surveies taken by the Cenfors of that age, two hundred and fifty thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and enroll ten legions compleat of Roman Citizens well near and none elfo. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tufe an, in Hetruria, in Umbria, take also the Gauls with you their enemies, likewise Lucania in Samnium. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Latium E with the Sabins, Volscians, and Equians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Hetruria, with the Picentes the Marfians, Pelignians, Vestins, and Apulians, and all the coast adjoyning thereto of the Greeks, along the nether Tyrrhen fea, from the Thurians to Naples and Cumes, and from thence, the Samnits, as far as to Antium and Hostia. All these he should have met with, either mighty and puissant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their arms. He should have passed the seas himself, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians; for this was all his power. And in case he had joyned thereto, the Persians, Indians, and other such nations, he should have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and succour by them. Take this over and besides, The Romans had fresh supplies alwaies ready and near at hand, at phome in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it happed to Annibal warring in a frange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weather the country of the pons, a shield or buckler, and a spear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withall near hand, or to be lanced a far off. The souldiers, I confess, both of the one fide and the other, stood their ground furely, kept their place and array ftill within their feverall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalanx moved not, was fledfaft and alwaies after one fort: but the Romans battallon more diffinct, and confitting of many parts easie both to divide and display, or to joyn and reunite upon any occasion. To speak now of painfull work and travell, what fouldier is comparable to the Poman? Who better able G to endure all forts of labour? Alexander by the loss but of one battell had been clean done, and hir war at an end for ever. But the Romans, whose hearts, neither the shamefull digrace at Candium, nor the wofull defeat at Canna, could amate and dant; what power would have discouraged ? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had prosperity and good success in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes here have milled his Persians and Indians, and defire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and dastard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have faid, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the easie occurrents of war which this young Prince H his nephew,met withall in Afia, with the difficulties of his own that he found here in Italy, And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at sea, in the first Punick war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the wholeage of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equal fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punick and Roman war together, Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor. whiles the Empire of Macedonie was at the beft, and flood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perfes: and it never cost them the lois and overthrow of their ownpart, no, nor so much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it said without arrogancy, and fetting all our civill wars afide ; never were we diffressed, either by horse or foot, never in open field and battel ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of difadvantage, were we endangered. The fouldier in heavy and compleat harnels, I confels, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear shot of arrows, cumbersome forrests and woods, straight gullets, and unpassable wilds, without waies forward or backward : but let there be a thousand armies greater and fronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, solong as we hold together, and con-K time fill in this love of peace and care of civill concord, wherein we live at this present, we are able, and ever shall be, to discomfit and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Follim Flaccina, and L. Plantius Venox Confuls, The same year there came from fundry Nations of the Samnits Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to fuch effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat nay. And after they had for certain this together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee: at length after much fuit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanenses and Canusins weatied with rodes and spoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hoftages to Lucius Plantius the Conful, yielded themselves to his protection. The same L year first began Provosts to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws. given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themselves had made full for the one and the other, as a remedy for their flate, greatly decaied through civill discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the reft, Mentina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to fhrink and go backward, added to the reit, be semina, and r derina. When Appuls began once to infink and go backward, the Theatins, being also Apulians presented themselves unto the new Consuls, C. Janius Babulcas, and Q. Emplius Barbula, and such context into a league with the Romans. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perswasion induced all Apulias to be in peace with the Romans, and had considerally undertaken, as sureties and pledges to bring it to peace with the Romans, and had considerally undertaken. peace with the Komans, and had confidently indertaken, as interies and predest oping it to pass, they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as they should be insubjection to the people of Rome. After that Apalia was M conquered (for Jamin had won allo Tarentism, a strong town and a rich) they marched forward against the Lucaus. Then upon the sudden coming of Kinglian the other Consul, Nerulusus was by force taken, And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, which is the condition of the people of Rome, that the flate and weal publike of Capua were established by Roman discipline and governments the Antiats alfo, who made moan and complained, that they lived without positive set laws and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commissioners, to ordain Statutes likewise for that Colony. So, that not only the Romanarms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and near, and was of great request C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emylius Barbula Confuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Cost. by them created; Sp. Nautius, and M. Poplius, but configued them to L. Emplius the Dictator. Who with his General of N horse, L. Fulvius, beganto lay siege to Satricula, whereby he gave the Samnits occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one fide the Samnits having affembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the fiege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans leaguer: on the other fide, the Satricans fet open their gates fuddennot far from the Comains leaguer. On the other that, the satisfains to open their gates models ly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And to both parts, relying rather upon hope of fuccour and help elfewhere, than trufting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner diplated, and diffressed them. And although the Dictator was affailed both waies, yet was he sare and fafe on either fide, because he had got a plot of ground, not easie to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his ensigns accordingly. Howbeit, 0 he charged more hotly upon them that fallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the wals. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnits being chaled and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, dislodged and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Satricula, they beseged Philia, a town consederate to the Romans, to requite their enemy with the like displeating the same of th fure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Confuls, like as the former remained fill at Rome. And Fabius came before Sacricula to receive the Army of Amylius, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnits made no flay at Pliftia, but having levied and lent for fresh fouldiers from home, prefuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore; where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmishes, they would have forced them to raise the fiege. But the Dictator so much more earnestly bent his forces against the wals of the enemies, thinking it the bett piece of service to assail the Town, as being of such importance to the rest of the war, which depended thereon: and was more carele is therefore of the Samnits, and only opposed against them certain guards both day and night, along B the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any affault upon the Camp. But the Samnits on the other fide, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horseback about the fortifications, and never gave them reft. Infomuch, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horse. Q. Emplius Caretanus, without advice and direction of the Dictator, riding forth in a great noise with all his Corners of Horie, repelled the enemy, But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no set battel of any long continuance, Fortune io plaid her part, and shewed what she could do, that on either side there be ell a notable loss, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnits first taking it to heart, to see Emplius fo fiercely ride and give the charge, and him elf to be diferrated and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he C advanced himself, bravely to be seen amongst his men and fought most variantly, the Roman General of the horse, with spear in rest, so galloped his horse, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead : and yet for all this was not the whole troop befides (as commonly it is feen) at the fall of their Captain to much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Amplius hard as he rathly rode without heed, and engaged himself too far within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnits Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and forrow, plucked Æmylius from his horse, and slew him in the place, even in the midft of his victory: and for that he tell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnits. But prefently the Romans aligh-D ted on foot, and the Samnits were forced to do the fame: and thus being arranged juddenly in great haste into battallons, there began a crueil fight on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Emylius, in great joy, intermingled with forrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnits thus having lost their Captain, and tried their strength what they could do in fight on horie-back, left Satricula, which they supposed could not possibly be defended, and fo returned again to the fiege of Plistia. After few daies, Sarricula was furrendred by compofition to the Romans, and the Samnits by affault won Pliftia. Then changed they the feat town of the war. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sora. This Sora was revolted to the Samnits, and had flain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans. E Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journies to revenge the loss of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their espials and scouts whom they had fent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnits followed, yea, and one after another gave advertisement, that they were not far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Lautula, there was fought a doubtfull and dangerous battel: for no flaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worfe. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romans loss the day, and that there died in this battell Q. Emplius Generall of the horse. C. Fabius chosen in the room of Emplius, came with a new and fresh army from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where r he should stay and rest, and what time, and which on side he should set upon the enemy: after lie was well informed and instructed in all points what to do, he put himself close in ambush. The Dictator himself, who had for certain duies after the last skirmish, kept his souldiers within trench, more like one besieged, than besieging; all on a sudden, put forth the signal and token of battell: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courages of hardy men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his fouldiers the coming of the General of Horse and his fresh forces; and as if there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and fally with violence: "We being The O at on (quoth he) my fouldiers, pent here and taken tardy in these straights have no other iffue but of @ Fabine "that which by victory we shall make open Our hold wherein we lie is fortified ture enough but Dictator to his G"the same for scarcity of all things noisome, irksome, and hurtfull to us: for all parts hereabout Souldiers, " are revolted from whence we should have convoy of victuals and were it that the people were "disposed to help us, yet the advenues & passages are hard, and the place of our abode in commo-"dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer, by leaving here your tents into which ye may after (ye have miffed the entire victory) betake your felves for fafety, as ye did the "other day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not "our arms by fenced forts. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to issue forth and to retire "thither again at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make a long war of it. But let "us cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a present and final victory. Advance then H your enligns directly against the enemy: and so soon as our Army is once without the trench "and rampiers, let them let the tents a fire, that have the charge so to do: you shall make up your your losses again,my fouldiers, with the spoil of all the nations hereabouts, that have revolted. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extream necessity, the fouldiers tookheart and were hot fet to march straight to the enemy. And the very fight of their tents burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them (abeit those only which stood next were set on fire for the Dickateris burning behind them). tor had given commandment) was no imall provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the first push and brunt they brake the array of the enemies : and withall, in good time, the General of the horfe, when he law a far off the tents on fire I (for that was the fignal agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and affailed them. So the Samnits being environed round about, made every man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and so sted. But the main multitude that were shuffled together all ona round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the prefs, was flain in the midft and cut in pieces the enemies camp won, and ranfacked: with the pillage whereof the fouldiers were laden and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not so joyous for the victory, as for the they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest sale

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Confuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpitius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old fouldiers, K and brought certain new cohorts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and unaccessible fight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make assault, and seeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was closely stoln out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Confuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withall, how and by what means he would perform that winch he undertook, feemed unto them to alledge fome reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so far with them, that he canied the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the wals, to be removed fix miles off the Town, faying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and leis careful and dili- L gent to keep the City. Himself the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of sootmen to lye in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him ten elect and chosen fouldiers; and through fleep places, and fuch as were not well paffable, conducted them into the Calile, having brought thither more shot and darts to throw than to serve so small a number of men befides, there was good fiore of frones at hand, which lay there, either feattering by chance (as commonly in such craegy and rocky ground) or else heaped together by the townsmen of purpose, for the better desence of the place. Where, after he had bestowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and steep path-way out of the town into the Castle, From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatelt multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans; and of Romans the M most hardy and valiant: the place will stead you, I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose, the night, I say, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men afrighted and amazed already. I will for my part set all in a hurly burly, look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortress. This said he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could, crying, Alarm, help, help Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy, come away to desence. These words he reconned ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he mer, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the fireets. This fearful alarm received from one man, was fet abroad by many more allover the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear fear certain to the Castle in espial to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle N was surprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing elle, more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortress. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unarmed. At one of thegates, those companies of the Romans aforelaid, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noise and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this fright ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won against the Consuls should come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whole fortune it was to scape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flie away those they took to mercy upon submission: whereof two hundred twenty five, even those who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre above said of the Roman Coloners, inhabi-0 tants, and the authors of therevolt they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sorafate and unburt, and planted there a garrifon. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-placescourged with rods, and beheaded. With the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it converned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their

The Confuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make war upon the Lands and

A Territories of the Aufonians; for the coming of the Samnits after the battel of Laurula, they were all out, full of infurrections and commotions, and many compiracies there were in all places. about Campania: neither was Capua it felf without blame and faultleis. Nay, this matter pailed as far as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Autonians, by reason that the Cities were herrayed, like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome, Aufon a Minturne, and Ve fina were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemenhaving conspired and A conspiracy fina were the Cities, out of which twelve of the them leves unto the Confuls, giving them of the Aulionians. to understand, "That their countrymen wished long ago for the coming of the Samnits, and so B" foon as they heard of the battel before Lautula, made account that the Romans were utterly "vanguished and helped the Samnits both with men and munition. But now, say they, that the a Sampits were chased from thence, they lived unresolute in doubtfull terms of peace, and thut on not their gates in dread upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet obsti-" nativ bent to thut them, if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubt-"ful floating of their minds, they might at unawares be inddenly surprited. By this perswasion of theirs they encamped nearer, and at one and the felf-tame time were fouldiers tent about those three towns before named, some in armor closely to lie in amoush in convenient places near the wals: others in fide gowns with twords under them, who a little before day, to foon as the gates were set open, should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was so handled, that at one infrant they began to kill the warders at the gates, and gave a fignal to those armed souldiers who lay in ambush, for to rise at once and come to succour. Thus were the gates seized and possessed. and three towns in one hour by the same stratagem surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captains, there was no stay in execution and slaughter, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no sex nor age was spared: and so the whole nation of the Aufones, before they were detected for certain of revolt, was destroyed and estinguished, as if they had warred mortally and been at deadly feud.

The same year Luceria came into the hands of the Samnits, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison to them; but the traisors went not long unpunished for its The Roman Army chanced to be not far from thence, and at the first assault, the City standing as Dit did on a plain, was won. The Lucerins and Samnits both were put to the fword every one: and so far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat sate in council at Rome, about fending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the City it selfshould be rased to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they have against them being twice conquered and revolted: the distance also of the place so remote, caused them to mislike greatly, and abhor the confining, as it were, of their Citizens, fofar from home, to live amongst such a kind of people so cruel and dangetous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed; who gave advice, that Coloners and inhabitants should thither be lent, and to the number of 2500 were there planted.

The same year when as the Romans found all unloyal unto them, and nothing but falshood E on all fides; at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the City were detested and revealed. Touching which the Senats advice was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but Commissions were appointed: and thought good it was that a Dictator should be nominated for to fit upon the same commissions and inquisitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Felliss General of the Horie, Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and thereupon either for fear, or guiltiness of conscience, the two Calavii. Ovius and Novius, who were the chief of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator died: & questionless by their own hands shortned their daies, and so avoided the triall of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the Inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquisitors (by interpretation of words in the Commission) proceeded to Rome saying, F that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and fraight fearch, not by name and precisely, who at Capua only; but generally, who in any place what foever had used conventicles, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and all secret meetings, say they, and packings together, for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly against the State and Common-wealth: so that the Commission extended larger both for person and real action. Yea, and the Dictator himself nothing gainfaid, but that the vertue of his Commission was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and not withstanding they called upon the Tribunes for to affift them, with interpoling their negative, yet there was not one of them would inccour and relieve them, the presentment was taken against them, and they indited. Then the Nobility, I mean nor them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole G Gentry of the City, at once, pleaded, That they were not the natural and true Noblemen indeed, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for finisher and indirect courses, had easie and open success unto all honourable places and promotions; but certain new upstarts and Gentlemen of the first head: saying, That it was the very case of the Dictator himself, and his General of Horse, who were rather parties guilty, and offenders themselves, than sufficient Inquistors, and competent Judges: and that should they well know and understand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Manius to bestir himself, who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and absolute absolute government, went up into the common place of audience beforeall the people, and spake H to this effect: "My Masters and triends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that privy ye are "to the whole carriage and course of my sormer life; and besides that, even this very honour and dignity which you have bestowed uponme, is able to testific and approve mine innocencie. "For to fit upon thele inquifitions, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes theretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed is the best and most noblest warrior of all other; but such a one, as throughout his whole life "hathmost of all missiked and condemned ambitious conventicless Howbeit, for a smuch as certain persons of, noble linige, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deem and judge, than for me being a Magistrate, to speak without book, as they say, and upon no sure ground) first have en-I deavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquintion it fell; and afterwards, feeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Pairiti) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justific themselves and stand to the trial of their cause: and at last having there also a repulse (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocencie) have saln upon us, and bashed not (privat men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man, and all the world may know, that as they have affired to compais that which they are not able to bring to pals, namely, to avoid the rendring an account of their life and demeanor; fo, I am ready (to fet forward their accusations) to offer my felf unto mine adverfaries and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here k I refign up my Dichatorship. And I befeech you, O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid on you by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Fellius: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the connenance and priviledge of our dignity and high calling, are protected and fate from thee flanders and intended rimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. F. dlim yielded up his room likewife of General over the Horie, These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and tethimonies of the Patriti, were in every point found unguilty, and acquit. P. Philo allo, albeit he had fo many times attained to the supream dignities of state, after he had atchieved so many wor. I thy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, wasput to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lafted no longer inforce, (as it is usually seen) than whiles it was fresh, and in the first heat therof, From them it beganto fall to perions of leis reckoning and baier account, untill fuch time, as by the same conventicles and sactions, against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was troden underfoot.

The bruit of these things, and more than that the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnits back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being to near at hand unto Capua, they might (if haply any infurrection and trouble presented the overture and opportunity) size they might (if haply any insurrection and trouble presented the overture and opportunity) size they on it and take it persone from the Romans. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the fifst they said and lingered about the passes and straights, having on the one ide and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Sammis fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champain country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a fight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishes, on horseback other than on foot, they tried masteries on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the iffue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the waralength. Contrariwife, the Samnit Captains perceived their forces to wear daily by small losles, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingting war. Whereupon, they came abroad N into the field and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp(for lear of any impression and assault that way) than to the main battel: which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The Coss, marshalled themselves in this manner Sulpitius led the right point of the battel and Petilius the left : the right fide (whereas the Samnits also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compais and environ the enemies, or not to be compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed it self more abroad and open. They on the left hand, befides that they flood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a indden policy of Petilius the Col, farther strengthned. For those cohorts and bands which were reserved apart in the rereward for help at any need and kept fresh against all occurrents and hazards of long fight, he advanced prefertly to the forefront in the vangard, and with all his forces at 0 once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat, When the footmen of the Summits were thereby troubled and difarraied, the horsemen followed close and entred into the skirmith. But as they rode cross and overthwart between the two hofts, the Roman horiemen pricked and galloped their horses to flank them; and disordred and troubled the ensigns, cornets, foundrons and troops of foot and horte, pell-meli together, until he had caused the whole battel of that fide to turn their backs. In this left point not Petilius alone but Sulpitius also joyned with him, and was prefent in person to exhort and encourage the souldiers: for he had transported and a diffracted himfelf from his own men, who as yet were not come to joyn battel at the cry & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge accompanied with 1 200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and loft ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his enfigns upon them fore difmaid and daunted. How beit, the Conful his coming made a prefent alteration: for both at the fight of their Captain were the fouldiers hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed, than in shew of number, of tall and lusty men. So when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all fides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnits giving over fight, B were either flain or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record, that there were upon 30000 Samnits, either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Confuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith from thence lead their Legions to lay fiege unto Bovianum: and there wintred before the Town, untill fuch time as C. Perilins Cholen Dictator together with M. Fellius his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. Papyrius Curfor the fifth time, and C. Jun. Bubulous the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Castle of Fregella was by the Samnits taken, left Bovianum, and went forwind to Fregelle, which he recovered again without drawing his tword; for that the enemiested quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garifon there he returned from thenceinto Campania, of special purpose to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the wals, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnits, and the ruftical peafants about Nota. The Dictator having viewed the scituation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the wals, set all the houses on fire that were in the subburbs along the counterscarpe (and there they stood thick and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petilius Dictator (Iknow not) or C. Jumins Conful (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced and won. They that would draw unto the Conful the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and fay, That he won also Atina and Calaia: and that Petitiss upon a petitilence that began, was made Dictator, for the fetting or fashning of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Sunessand Pontia. Suessa belonged to the Aurunci. The Volscians inhabited the Island Pontia, situat over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to Cassinum alfo, a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs, for that purpose, and sent sour thousand to people those places,

The war with the Samnits was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brute was blown of the Tuscans war. And there was in those daies another nation (setting the Gauls tumults aside) whose forces and hostility they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, whiles one of the Confuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the E war in Sammium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously fick, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger for to take the military oath, and preft them for fouldiers. Armor, and what foever requisite befides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus furnished and well apointed, yet was he nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and fland upon his guard, unless the Tuicans shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuicans alto, both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their own limits.

In that year was there a famous Cenforship of App, * Claudius, and C. Plautius. But the name * Surnamed of Appius became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that Catus, that is, The paved with ftone the cautey or *Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of *water into the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone for that his Collegue for shame of an *One of the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone for that his Collegue for shame of an *One of the City of Rome. infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made gave over the office. But Appiriver Anio, and ms having the front fromack, engraffed in his name and house from the beginning bare the Centor- was called thip alone. By the motion and means of the same Appins, the Potitii, to whole family properly Aqua claudian belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Hercules called Maxima, had taught certain publike fervants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegats) the folemn rites and ceremonies of that facred ministry. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve hou-Gles of the Potitii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age; within one year it is faid, that they died all, with their whole issue and off-spring. Moreover, that not only the name of the Potitis became thus extinct, but that Appius alfothe Cenior, within certain years (fuch was theire of the gods mindfull of revenge)fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that sollowed in the next year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emplius Barbula the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leud and corrupt Election of some new Senators, that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how fome were over-flipt, who were of most worth than those that were taken in : And saying plainly,

That they would not observe and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of good and bad was made for favour and affection to some, and at the pleasure of the Ceniors; and immediatly they (ited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been used before the

Cenfors, App. Claudius and C. Plantins. And in that year were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that fixteen Colonels for four * Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Dictators and Confuls; and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duum-I virs at lea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. simes, of 3000.

Decius, another Tribune of the Commons. I would let pass onething that hapned this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minstrels that plated upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the laft Cenfors, to have their good chear any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custome and tradition, took fouff thereat, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: fo as there was not one of them in the City left to fing and pipe before the pomp of facrifices, and longed besides on their feastival daies. The Senat made some conscience hereof, and were troubled in their mind, Whereupon they dispatched certain messengers to Tybur, to travel with the townsmen, and en- g deavour all they could that these good sellows might be restored and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburtins undertook the matter, and promifed right courteoully to do their beff: and first they fent for these musicians into their Town-Hall, and perswaded with them to return again nothing to do, to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that forted and fitted well the humour of fuch kind of people and of their coat. Upon a festival holyday, under a colour of making merry with minstrelse and musick about them, some invited one, and some another, to give them a fit of mirthaccordingly. But they plied them to with wine (which all the fort of this profession love buttoo well) that they drank until they winked, and winked to long, till they fell fast alleep. And being found asleep, the Tyburcins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus beflowed, conveyed them to Rom. Neither perceived they ought senseless drunken forts they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and concocted their wine that fleamed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day-light cameup on them and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands or charged them to stay, and make no more such frolicks, it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being difguiled and dreffed in a mask for the purpole, they might range and walk about the City, with finging, and founding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adaies is yearly used, and their priviledge of eating in the temple was reflored to them again, namely, to fuch as sung and plaied in time of their divine service and sacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidst the care! and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Confuls parted their Provinces between them : To Junius, fell by lot the Samnits, to Emp lius the new war in Hetruria. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortress and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an affault, was a long time belieged; and forced by extream famine, was delivered up to the Samnits. After they were once Masters of thefort, they took the garrison fouldiers, and not with flanding they yeelded themselves, yet they whipped and taretheir flesh most beastly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wroth at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done first, than the winning again of Cluvia; laid all other matters ande, and the same day that he assailed the wals, took it by force, and slew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought against Booianum, This was the chief place of the Pentrians in Sammium, the wealthiest City, the best provided, and most sure nished of all other with men and munition. The souldiers very eager and sharp fet for hope of a rich pillage won the Town. But for that they were nothing so angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and saccage from thence than they ever had well near out of all Samnium; and as liberally was it bestowed every whit upon the fouldiers. And for almuch as no pitched battel in plain field, no Camp so well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howsoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wis to find means of fleight and fibrill policy; if haply, as they wasted and forraged the Territorie after a loose and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed within some ambush. It fell out so, that certain sugitive peasants of the Country, and Captives, fome by chance, and other of purpose, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Confuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same sounding of a truth indeed, namely, that a great fort of sheep and other cattel were driven together into a by-forrest out of the way: and soinduced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnits had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they faw the Romans to have entred & engaged themselves within the chase orforrest aforesaid, all of fudden they role up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strange and unexpected occurrence made them afraid, while they took them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heap in the midft. But after that every man was eased of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all fides to their entigns; and without the commandment or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battel in array, each one knowing his ranke and place according to the accultomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Conful perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battel, alight from his horie; and protested before Japiter and Junius the Mars, and the other gods whom he called all to witness: "That he came not into that place to fouldiers, "get glory to himself by any enterprise, but only a booty for his souldiers: and that no fault else "could be imputed unto him, but an overmuch defire and affection of his, to enrich his fouldiers "by the spoil of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and acquit "him elfe, but the manhood and prowess of his souldiers: exhorting them with one accord but "toftay themselves and endeavour all together to set upon their enemy, defeated and vanquished "in battel, driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and strong holds, and come now " to attempt his last and utmost hope, of privy and theevish trains of forlaying trusting upon the "vantage of the ground, and not pureforce of arms. But what place is there now unaccessible or " unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Herewithall he named the Castle of Fregella and Sora, and what place of difvantage and hard access soever, they had won by force. With these words the fouldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all difficulties and dangers, marthed apace and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romans found some difficulty all the while they climed up the lift or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the formost ensigns were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattelled upon an even and equall ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them. & being disbanded, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and trudged as falt as they could to recover again those starting and lurking holes, wherein before they had hid themselves. But even those difficult places which they had fought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encumbred themfelves. For very few of them could find the way out, and escape by flight, Insomuch as to the number of 20000 were flain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleafure to that booty of sheep and cattel, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with, Whiles these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hetruria by this time, but only the Aretins, were up in arms, and entred into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and affault of Surrium: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would fay) the very Barriers of all Hetruria. Thither came the other Conful Amylius with an army, to rescue and deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romans coming, the Sutrins curteously brought victuals for the Camp, lying before the City. The Tuscans spent the first day in consulting whether they should make a short war of it, by hot assaults, or temporise and protract the time by lingring fiege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and hafty courses, than of more sage and safe proceedings, at the sun rising they set out a slag of defiance and the fignal of battel, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. Which after it was told the Conful, prefently he commanded a watch-word to begiven, that the fouldiers should take their breakfast: and after they had refreshed and strengthned their bodies with sood, go straight to arm themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consul seeing them well appointed in readiness, commanded the ensigns to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marshalled his battels. For a good while they stood on both sides, wistly looking, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past moon before there was one dart flung or javelin lanced either from the one fide or the other. But p then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tuscans began to set up a cry, the trumpets found the charge, and the standards came forward. Neither were the Romans any jot behind to begin battell: Thus they ran to it, and encountred with exceeding animofity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardiness and vertue. The fight was doubtful, and dangerous, and coft the life of many a man on both fides, and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any parc, before that the second battaillon of the Romans, fresh and lufty, advanced to the forefront of the vangard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuicans, for that their vangard was not inpplied and reenforced by any new fuccours, both before and all about their enfigns were beaten down and flain every man, Never in any one barrel had there been less running away, or more bloudshed, if the night had not protected the Tuscans: so resolute were they all to die in the place: insomuch as the winners gave over play before the losers. After the fun set, the retreat was sounded: and by night both parts returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Surrium that year, worth remembrance : both for that, the foreward of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battell defeated and destroyed; and they had none left but the Subfidiary fouldiers of the rereward, and those hardly able and sufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battell of their hurts than were flain in the very skirmish outright. Q. Fabine, Consul for the year following, succeeed and entred upon this war at Surrium. And for his collegue he had C. Martius Ruedius: and like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bands, so there came fresh forces also unto the Tuscans, levied at home, For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magistrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention out of that family and house, which even then was fatall, (as it were) and born to do mischief to the Tribunes and Commons both. Appins Claudius the Cenfor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Emplia was the full term of bearing that Magistracy) notwithstanding that C. Planinishis Collegue had given up his office; could by no means possible beforced himself to go out and give over the place. Then role up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who took in hand this matter, as touching the demission of the Censorship, within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtless, not more popular than just and rightfull, nor less acceptable to the better for, than pleafing to the very Commons and base people. He having frequently rehearsed and reiterated the law Emilia, extolled with praises up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, Ma mercus Emplius a Dictator; who had reduced the Cenforship, an office aforetime of five years continuance (a puissance and authority, which by the length thereof savoured of Lordship Jwithin the compais of a year and fix months. "Come on, quoth he, Appins Claudius, answer and say, "what you would have done in case you had been Censor, when C. Furius, and M. Giganius were "Cenfors? App'us answered and said, that this demand and question of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cause. For put the case, that the law Emplia had obliged those Cen-I fors, during whose Magistracy the Act was made, (for that after those Cenfors created, the pre-plehad granted that law, and look what they last allowed and ordained, the same was good lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Confors, could be bound by vertue of that law. Whiles Appius thus cavilled, and no man thereprefent foothed him up,or gave applause and affent unto him: "Behold Quirites, quoth Sempronius. The Oration again, the progeny and race of that Appine, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected of P. Semproni " himself the second year : and in the third, being chosen neither by himself, nor by any other,in quality of a private person, held the loveraign dignity and government, with all the regall make of the Com-"and enligns thereof: and thus continuing still in rule and dominion, would never give over, " before that his usurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtly kept and the stained, were his final fall and utter overthrow. finally, this name is much more fpightfully and mortally bent against your freedom, than that es of the Tarquins. And is it so indeed, O App. Clandius? Would you have us beleeve, that bees ing now an hundred years fince Mamerous Emplius was Dictator, there have been fo many "Cenfors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables " and none of them knew that to belaw which the people last granted and allowed? Yes Iwis, es they all wist that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Amplia "thanthe old and ancient Statute, (whereby the first Ceniors were created in the Common wealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason that there are two ordinances es repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new alwaies repealeth and abrogateth the "repugnant and contrary one of the third "old. And is this your faying, O Appins? That the people are not bound to the law Empliators there that they are tied unto it, but your good less alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was then a we Emplia able to bridle and curb those violent Censors C. Furius, & M. "For L. Papirius neither alone, nor yet beyond the just set time by law, administred his Censorship: D" yet found he never any one person after him, that would imitate and follow his example. All "Cenfors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Cenfor gave up the office, But "as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your compani-"on in government departed out of the place; neither law not shame, is able to rule and re-"Arain. You suppose that vertue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldness, in contempt both of "God and man. For mine own part truly, O Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majefly of this "honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard cour-" les, as to touch your person by violence of hand; no, nor so much as to offend your name with "any foul or unkind language, But as these words that have already passed, your own peevish and "perverle frowardness, your opinionative contumacy, and infolent pride, having wrung and for-E" ced from me : to unless you will obey the law Emplia, by your leave, I will be to bold as com-"mand you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and or-"dained, that in the Elegion of Cenfors, if either of the twain come short of sufficient voices re-" quifite for to choose him the other cannot be admitted and declared Centor; and so they must e proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect : shall I suffer you to "exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alledged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, six of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only assisted Appius; who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawfull succour: and so with exceeding ill will, and highest discontentment of all states and degrees, he went clear away, and bare F the Cenforthip alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, and Sutrium was besieged still by the Tuscans: and as the Conf. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hils, certain forces to fuccour his allies, & to alfail the fortifications of the enemies what way be could, they with an army in battel at ay mee with him. Whole great multitude when he might discover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, up toward the hill tops (which were rough and traggy places pred all over with flores) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tufcans fogetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof only they prefumed; gave battell fo hastily and in such greediness, that casting away their shots and darts from them, to G the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary side laid load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plenteously afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and stuck upon their shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies easily come within them to fight neer and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to fling and launce afar off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they flood still exposed as Buts, to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover and protest them infliciently; whiles some of them al-H to gave ground and retreated, and the whole battel was wavering and uniteady, the Roman Haftasi and Principes, Came forward with a new shout, and charged them afresh. This violent affault could not the Tu(cans beat, but turning their enfigns, fled amain in difarray toward their camp. But when as the Roman horsemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before, met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains: from whence with their whole company in a manner disarmed and fore wounded, they recovered the fortest Ciminia. The Romans having slainmany thousands of the Tuscans, gained thirty eight enfigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage; began to consultabout purfuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were I of late daies the German forrests: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented fo much as by merchants. And scarcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it for, all the rest had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Candium. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Caso, and as other some C. Clanding, his brother only by the mothers fide) promifed that he would go as a front infpiall, to descry the wood, and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Care, among the ancient friends of his house and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tukan learning and knowledge, and thereby wasperfect in their tongue and language. And I find fome authors of credit that writ, how in those daies the Romans young children went to school for to learn to parl Tuscan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it standeth more like a truth, that K there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and infinuate himfelf amongst the enemies. It is faid, that one only servitor accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nurfed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a generall fort, learn the nature and fite of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk, they might not falter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herdmen, armed like country Kernes or Peasants each of them with a faulchion and two javelins, But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they L were, or weapons that they carried faved them to much as this one thing, That no man would ever beleeve, that any forreiner and it ranger durft enter upon those thick Ciminian forrests, Well, forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camertins in Umbria. There the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought is to their Senat, he treated with themin the Confuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteoutly entertained and friendly intreated he had his difpatch, and was willed to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Alio, that the youth of the Camertins in Umbria should be at their command, prest in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consol, after that he had sent before his carriages at the first watch of the night and commanded the legions to goafter, himself staid M fill with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the corps de guard of his enemies, which were quartered without the forrest, and when he had long enough kept them Fl y, and amufed them at his pleasure, he retired into his Camp; from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtaketh the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break, he was got up to the creft of the hill Ciminius: from whence, after he had beheld and vewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Herraria, he fendeth out his fouldiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving a fat booty, certain tumultuary bands of the ruftical Pealants of Hetruria, gathered together in great hast, and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but so out of order were they that being come to rescue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves. A N number of them were flain or put to flight, and the Romans, having wasted and made spoil all overthe country, enriched with flore of all things, returned victorious into their Camp, Thither were arrived (as it fellout) five messengers or pursevants with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the forrest Ciminius. But these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprifes; returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Col, the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched & brought to an end. For all that track lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminius, felt the imart of this rode: and provoked to anger & defire of revenge, not only the State of Hetruria, but also the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to 0 Surrium agreater power than ever afore : for not only they removed their Campforward out of the woods but also for the eager desire of fight with alspeed, they came abroad into the plain field. Afterwards, they flood first embattelled in a plot, by them fitly chosen, leaving over against thema spa e of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battel : but perceiving the enemies to fall off, scloath to fight, they approached the very trench and tampiers; but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains for to give order, that the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day should be brought them thither out of the camp; for they would flay in their armor and harmels, as they were, and either in the night, or elfe in the morning betimes by day-light, give the affault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in Now it was welneer the * tenth hour of the day; When as the Conful willed his fouldiers to * Four a clotk take their refection, and warned them to be ready in armes at what hour foever by day or by night atter noon, he should give them the signal of battell. And in the mean time maketh a short speech unto them, praising highly, and fecting out of the Samnits wars, debaling the Tulcans, taying, that there was no compartion between either enemy to enemy, or number for number over and befides, he faid that he had another feat and secret devise in store for them, which they should know when time ferved; in the mean while they must keep silence of necessiry, and hold their peace. By these dark figreeches and hidden mysteries, he made semblance, as though he had some privy intelligence, B that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came this did he, to the end, that the heart of his fouldiers (which haply were diffusied and discouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreshed : and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The fouldiers having taken their repail, they laid their bodies to repole and fleep, and fomewhat before the telicfe of the fourth Betweentwo watch, they were railed without noile, and armed themselves. The souldiers boics and lackies, and anothree of fuch as followed the camp, had mattocks and ipades divided amonglithem, to call down the ram-clock in the pire, and to fill up the ditches with the bank, whiles that within the compatte and circuit of the morning. camp, they were marshalled in battell array. The choice of cohorts or bands were placed at the A Cohort is gates and passages forth. Then at the found of trumper, a little before day (which in summer nights a regiment or C is the time of the deepelt and foundest fleep) the whole army, when the rampue was laid along band of 500 and levell, iffued forth at once, and charged theenemies on all fides, lying here and there cattered tootmen comon the ground. Some before they were firring, others half afteep and half awake in their coumonly, Once

Few had time to put themselves in armour, and they having no enfigns, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans foon discomfitted, put to flight, and pur- cohorts, of 400 fued in chafe. Some made halt to the camp, other to the woods, fundry waies one from another. But and no more: the woods were the fatest place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the same day taken, and won. All the gold and filver there found, was by expresse commandment brought unto the Conful his pavilion; the reft of the pillage, was the fouldiers thare. Slain and taken priloners that day there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This fo noble a battel (fome Writerslay) was fought on the other fide of the wood Ciminia, before Perufia : who also report; that the City of Rome was in great fear, lest that the army being inclosed within to dangerous a wood, should have been surprised and descated by the Tuscans and Umbrians, who were tisen up in arms together from all parts. But wherefoever it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embaffadors from Perufia, * Cortena, and * Aretium, where were in maner the chief and princi. * Corte Emonisaous from reviews of the Romans for peace, and a league Continue.

During these affairs in Herraria, the other Conful, C. Martins Rutilius, wan from the Samnits the town * Allifas. Many other villages and castles were either atterly demolished and destroied Alphi-E by way of extream hostility, or yeelded fafe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time the Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. As they stragled all over the fields, no man made head against them, at what time, as they might have been foon flain every one; but as they were returning with a difordered march, and froed not upon their guards, a troop of the pealants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and eafed them of their spoil and pillage, and flew some of them : the reft of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were chaled to

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the fortelt Ciminia, as it canfed great fear in Rome, fo it gave occasion of as joyful news in Saminium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was that up and befieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a loffe and shameful difgrace at Glandinin; reporting and giving forth, that these Romans being a nation greedy alwaies of increaching farther, and winning more ground, were through the fame raffine fife now run headlong into the blind forrests impassable, and invitoned not so much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In such fort as amid this foy of theirs, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the Romans, from the Samnits, to the Tulcans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Martius the Conful ferever : minding from thence, in cale Martin would not abide a pattell, ro go into Heiruria through the Marfi and Sabins, But the Conful met with them by the way; where was fought a shape and crueli hattell with doubtful event, and much effusion of bloud on both fides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part loft more bloud, yet the rumour went, that the Romans had the

worfe, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one H Lieurenant; and that which made most, for that the Conful himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is feen) got more feathers fill as it flew, and made every thing greater : fo as the LL of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Fapirius Carfor should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be affured of fending a meffinger iste into Samnium (confidering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Conful was for certain alive. And as for the other Conful Fabins, upon an old feerer and privat gradge, he mali. ced Papirius : which quarell, left it might hinder the fervice of the Commonweal, the Seine thought good to fend unto him certain Embassadors (as it were jeven such as had been Consus; who of their own authority, as well as by vertue of publick commission from the State, should admonifh and counfel himto remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake, When these personages were come to Fabius the Col. and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withall such speech and reasons of their own, as fixed well to the errand they had in charge : the Col.calling his eies down toward the ground, departed from the Embassados without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do, But the night following, in the dead time (as the maner is) he nominated L. Papirise for Dictator. And when these mellengers or Embalisdors gave him great thanks for maltering and riling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution till of filence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himfelf, dilmifled them ; that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty ftomack, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and initeful anger of his, Papirim named C. Janim Babulens commander of the borfe. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people affembled by the Curie or wards, there hapned a mater of ominous prefage, which caused that businesse to be put off untill the next day a for that the ward Faucia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the same Curie likewise began the suffrages first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace, Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third loffe and calamity teceived at Cremera. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Aufpices, went through with the act, and obteined his commission, and fer forward with the legions lately mustered and enrolled upon the fearfull alarm given, that the Roman army was passed the wood Cyminia, until he arrived at Longula; where, after he had received of the Conful Marting, the old bands of fouldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part feemed not to refute fight; ho wheir, as they stood armed and aranged, and neither the one fide nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped neer together in rell and quiet for certain dayes, neither diftrulting their own pullfance, nor yet difdaining and delpifing their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria . for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians : howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfitted and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animofity as they began : and also neer the lake and Mear *Vadimon, the Tuicans had levied a new army, *Ligoti vitir according to a facted law, wherby one man had cholen another (who as fworn brethren were to to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before : and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountred, that of neither fide they thought of discharging shot and lancing darts, but began at the very first with their fwords to go to handstrokes : and the conflict being right fiercelybegun, increased ftill, and waxed hotter in the very skirmith, and continued for a good while to doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tufcans to often by them defested and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flighton neither fide; downgo the formost, and lay dead before their Standards; and lest that the enigns should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the bartaillon came in place to supply the first . and so frill new succours and fresh were fet even as faras from the rereward behind, destined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horimen abandoning their hories alighted on foot, and were fain to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all ipread upon the ground; which new troop and battaillon rifen and iprung (as it were) a fresh, to reenforce and firengthen their diffressed fellowes, disordred the squadrous and enligns of the Tuicans. The other legionary fouldiers, wearied (as they were) followed had and teconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tulcans as shifte as they stood afore, began to have the worls, and certain bands gave way and retreated; and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to take their heels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrew and laid along the pair 0 fance of the Tulcans, who abounded to long in wealth and fortunate prosperity. Their whole floor and ftrength which they had, was in this battell flam, and at the fame time their camp won and

With like hazard and glorious successe of the end, was the war managed with the Samuls foon after; who belides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that

A their army should glitter and shine againe with a new kind of garnishing their harnesse and armors. For having divided their forces in two armies, the one had laid their shields with gold, the other with filver. The form and fashion whereof was this, that upper part where with the breit and shoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even height; but the nether end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedgewife, for to weld it more numbly; Their breaft and flomack was fenced with ipunges, the left leg armed with a good greeve, their morions with high crefts made a thew of tall flature. The fouldiers aforefaid with guilded thields wore coats of fundry colours ; the other with filvered, white linnen : and these had the leading of the right wing, or point of the pattell; but they of the left. The Romans had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor : and their Captains had B taught them afore, that a fouldier ought to be dieadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and filver, but trufting in the fharp edge of iron and fteel, and a good heart and courage withall : and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than at mor of proof; fair and resplendent, before men come to the sharp, but foul and unseemly amongst bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a louldier, is valour and hardineffe; as for all those beaveries, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would ferve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never to poor and needy. With thele speeches after that Curfor had animated his fouldiers, he leadeth them into the field, himtelf he pur in the right wing; the left he committeeth to the conduct of the Generall of horie, so foon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardy had they with the enemy, and no leffe emulation there was between the Dictator and him; ftriving much whether of them twain should begin the victory. But as hap was, first Junius dilordered the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right luftly the right wing of the enemies : laying ever and anon, That he offered and facrificed unto the Devill and infernall spirits, those souldiers of theirs, consecrated already unto them after the maner of the sa units, and decked accordingly in white livery, and bright filvered armour, futing in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his standards, brake their araies, and made the battell to shrinkevidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, How now quoth he, shall the victory begin at the left wing, and shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battelof another, and not cary away with it the greatest part of the victory? Herewith he letteth on his of fouldiers, yet gave the horsemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the service of the Lieutenants was inferiour to the Captains themtelves and chief commanders: M. Valerius on the right point, P. Decim on the left, both Confular men, put themselves forward, and rode out to the borimen aranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged acroffe upon the fides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every fide entred the battel of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrific them the more, had redoubled a fresh shout, & charged them with greatfury, then began the Samnits to flie amain. Now weie the fields overtpread with the bodies of finn men, and firewed thick with armor, crewbile fo brave and glorious : and at the fiff, the Samnits in great affright recovered their tents ; but being there, were not able fo much as to keep them, for they were won and rifled before night, and fire feruponthem. The Diffator by a decree of the Senat triumphed : and the faid armor which was taken from the enemy; made the goodlieft pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph : which carried to starely a fliew and magnificent, that the guilded shields were divided amongst the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldsmiths, to the beautifying of their Hal and Market place, And hereof began first the custome of the Ædiles, to adorn and let out the common place of the City in their folemn processions, when the facred images of the gods and hely reliques were carried about for pomp in filver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim armor of their enemies to this use, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campains upon a pride and inveterate harred that they bare against the Samnits, used to arm their sword players and fencers at the sharp (which was a folcom fight and pastime they had at their great scalls) with this same attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnits.

The same year Fabius the Conful fought with the rest of the Tulcans at * Perusia (which City * Perusia.) alio had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory, And the very town it lelf he had forced & won(for in the fame train of his conquelt he approached the wals) but that their Embassadours came forth and yeelded the City. When he had placed a good garriion at Perulia and fentbefore him to Rome unto the Senat, the Emballadours of Hetru ia, who treated for peace; he being but Conful, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictatour. And that for a good part of the honor of fulduing the Samnits, was afcribed to the Lieutenants P. Decim. and M. Valerina, therefore at the next Election, the people with general affent declared the one Confel, and the other Pretout. Fabiss for tanging Hetraria fo bravely and valiantly, continued Confull still, and had for his Colleague P. Dec. m. Valerim was created Pretor the fourth time. The Confuls parted between them the provinces, Herraria tell to Dec'us, Samnium to Fabius. Who taking his voiage to Nucerta, laid fiege to the City of the Allifats, and won it by affault; and not withftanding they made fut for peace, he rejected and despited them; for that when it was offered, they would not accept. it. With the Samnits he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were vanquishe 3. Nother had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marsians H first took arms and warred with the Romans, After the Marsians were revolted, the *Peliguans did the temblable, and speed alike. Decimal allo the other Conful had good successe in his wars. He drave the Tarquinians for feat, to find the army corn, and to suc for a truce of forty years. Certain drave the Tarquinians for the to, for cabby wan: some of them he utterly tased, for that they castles and holds of the Volteinians, he forceably wan: some of them he utterly tased, for that they castles and bolds of the Volteinians, he forceably wan: some of them he utterly tased, for that they called the arm to early the state of the them he utterly tased, for that they where, he became to tertible, that the whole Tusean nation made sute to the Consul for peace and where, he became to tertible, that the whole Tusean nation made sute to the Consul for peace and consideracy, it they could not obtain but truce for a year was granted. In regard whereof, for that consideracy, it they could not obtain but truce for a year was granted. In regard whereof, for that consideracy, it is the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every souldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and fine that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tufcans, the fudden revolting of the Umbrians, a nation free, and faved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only, that the Loman army passing through their territories troubled all anew : for they having raifed the firength and flower of their youth and follicited also a great part of the Tuscans to rebell, levied so greata-power that making no accompt of Decini, whom they left behind them in Herraria, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to stiguit Keme. Which deligne of theirs, to foon as it was reported to Decine the Cos. he made speed, and by long journies departed out of Hetraria toward the City, and in the Country of the Papinians, encamped himfelf; liftning ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Kome was the Umbrians war neglected and fet light by a for their very threats and menaces K feared them, as who atready had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands, how unfure a City they inhabited and not unpregnable. Therupon messengers were dispatched to the Col. Fabius, That if he had any breathing time, and reft from the Samnits war, he should with al speed lead his army into Himbria. The Col. obeyed, and by great journies went forward to * Mevania, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This fudden and unexpected coming of the Col. whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, to terrified the Umbrians, that tome gave advice to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquifi the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they then lelves call Materna not only kept the relt in arms, but allo let them on to fight immediatly, to as they charged upon F4. bins, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Col. (aw rushing upon his rampiers in L fuen heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he manshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his fouldiers with a true report & difcourse of many glorious and honourable journies archieved as well in Thaseia as also in Sammun he willed them to dispatenthis (mal residue of the Tulcan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accurred and impious speech, whereby they threatned to assail the City of Rome, Thefe words of his were heard by the fouldiers with fuch alacrity and cheerfulness of hear, that pefore their General had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and in terrupted him : and thus before commandment and fignall given by found of trimpets and conets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and those allo aimed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to plack they banners and ftreamers out of the bearers hands, after that, the enfign-bearers themselves were led to the Confuls, and the fouldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battalon into another, and where there was any fenffling they fought not fo much with fword as buckler : and what with their boffes and iron pikes, and what with juffling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overthrown and felled. In which skirmith, more men were taken then flain; and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendred themfelves : and the morrow after, and other daies following, the reft of the people of Uniform likewise yeelded. The Otriculans by Hipulation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabius having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his N army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulfuip sto the Senat against the year following, when 4. Claudins, and L. Volumnius were Cost prorogued his martial tule fill, maugre the heart of Appins who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find that Appins, whiles he was Center seed to be Cnoful, and that his Election was croffed and flaied by L. Farius, a Tribune of Com until be had retigned up the Cenforthip, Being created Cof, and the war with the Salentins (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Collegue, he remained at Rome; that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might sugment his own litate and authority, fince that the honour of war-levice refled in the bands and conduct of another. Volumnius had no cause to repent of his charge and province for many fortunat battels he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won-0 He was a bountiful giver of the spoil away unto his fouldiers : and this bounty in it felt alone to ceptable, he helped much with great courteffe and gentleneffe, by which vertues and artificial means, he made the fouldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in travell, atle day left behind and yet before night, they were befet round about in their hold, yea, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they beganto yeeld themselves, and to capitulate, that as many Samnits as there were among them, should be sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no fuch provide nor composition made, but they all, to the number of leven thouland, were fold as flaves, and wore a garland. As many as advowed themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forth coming. All thole Fabins tent to Rome to the Senat, and untill such time as enquiry was made, whether in a publick muster they were pressed souldiers or voluntarily served under the Samnits against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among fundry nations of the Latins: during which time, the new Confuls, Public Cornelius Arvina, and Quintius Martius Tremulus for thole were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senat. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Councel in the round Cirque, which they call Maritemus, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatrinats, Ferentinats, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclamed war against the people of Rome. In Sammum allo, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arole new troubles and rebellions. Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garrilons that there lay, were put to the fword. and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Conful was thither fent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That war should be made upon the Anagnins and the other Hernicks.) At the first the enemies had so seised all the convenient passes and waies between both the Confuls camps, that there could not readily passe a lackey or currier between, in so much, as for certaindaies both Contals abode doubtfull how the world went, and uncertain one of the others state. The fear whereof, spred to Rome, so as all the younger fort [from feventeen years of age to feven and forty] ware to ferve and against all fudden occasions, and occurrents whatfoever, two full and compleat armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancien: glory and reputation of that nation : for having done no worthy adventures, and within few dates lost their camp thrice, they covenanted for to have thirty dates truce ; during which time, they might fend Embaffadours to the Senat of Rome: and in confideration hereof, they promifed to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every fouldier one coat. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martius: unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commission was granted, to dispose of the Hernicks as he he thought good . and so he took the whole nation as yeelded to his devotion. The other Conful in Samnium being in forces more puilsant then the enemy, was not withfranding encumbred much with the difficulty of the ground. All the passages had the enemie stopped, and possessed huntels of the forrests and woods which were thorow faires, that no way victuals might be conveied unto him. Neither could the Conful, for all that daily he displaied banner in field, train them forth to fight : fo as it was well teen, that neither the Samnits could abide prefent battell, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Martins who upon the subduing of the Hernicks, made halt to aid his Colleague, cauled the enemy to defer no longer the triallof the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army knew but wel that if they inflered twoConfuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore for upon Margia su as he marched without order of battel. Hereupon in al half their truffes and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he fet his fouldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Conful. Afterwards the dust descried afar off, gave an al'arm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Confull prefently commanded to arm: and haltily bringing his fouldiers forth into the field, entred upon the battell of the enemics in the flank, whiles they were bufied in another skirmish. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away double victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. Thus, wherefoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midft of the enemies battel, he passed on towards their camp; which finding void of defendants, he took and fet afire. Which when the fouldiers of Martins law burning before their faces, and the enemy likewife, as they looked behind; then began the Sambits on all hands to flie; but killed they were every where down right; all places full of murder and flaughter: to in no part could they find means to escape and fave themselves. Now when there were thirty thousand of the enemies flain the Consuls sounded the retreat and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time behold, there were deteried a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply; and they gave occasion G of a new and fresh staughter. Against whom without commandment of Consul, or any signall received from their leaders, the Romans advanced lultily, crying aloud, that these Samoits were to be welcomed with an ill hanfell, and this their first training should colt them deer. The Confuls let the legions alone in this their fur ious heat, as who knew well enough, that these new comers feeing the old beaten fouldiers to altonied already and flying a way, would took have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion; for the whole forces of the Samnits as well old and new, fled apace unto the next mount ains a and thither the Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies finds for even H from the very hil tops which they held, they were beaten down, to that with one voice they all crawed peace. Then after the Confuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every fouldier a livery besides, they were permitted to fend Embassadours to the Senst, to treat and capitulat thereof. During which time, Cornelius was left in Samainm, and Martim returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his ftame riding on hortback (hould remain in the common place of affemblies, which was crected accordingly even before the Temple of Caffer, To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alarinats, the Verulans and Ferentinats, their own laws, and ancient liberties were reftored again, becaule they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchiled Citizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marry amongst the Romans, which liberty they only of the Hernickes for a good I while enjoied. The Anagains, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incorporat free denizens of Rome, but without the priviledge of giving voices and fuffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councels and making marriages with them, yea, and denied at all to elect any magiltracy, but only the function and minittry of divine fervice and facri-

The same year the Chappell of dame Salm was by C. Junim Bubulom now Centor, set out at a price to be built, which he in his Conful(hip had vowed, in the Samnits war. By his direction and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and causeys made, of all sides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expenses. The same year also, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians : and K their Embassadors who came for that purpose, were conticously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scip.e, With P. Decim General of the horle , and these were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars. Consuls were created L. Postbumin, and T. Minnim But Pife (ayth, that these Consuls immediatly succeeded Q. Fabins and P. Decius: leaving out thole two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volumnius, and Cornelius With Marsius Were Confuls, Whether he forgot himself in digesting his Annals and yearly records, or of fet purpole overhipt two couple of Confuls, thinking that they were not in truth Confuls, I wot not.

The same year the Samnits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and ap- L purtenances of the Campains, and therfore both Confuls were fent into Samniam: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Posthumius took his journey to Tefernam, and Minatius to Bevianum: first there was battell fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Post humins. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Samnits were discomfitted, and put to the worse, and thirty thoufand of them taken pritoners : others say, that the conflict was equall, and that they departed on even hand : also that Post hum: 100 making semblance of fear, journyed by night, & closely retired unto the hils adjoyning, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Consul, because he would be thought to have fought and choic a fafe place, and plentifully stored with all necessaries (as it was no leffe indeed) where he might keep a standing camp ; after he had fortified the same , and fur-M nished it with all kind of provision, leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence; at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neerest way, his legions not encumbred with cariage, to his Colleague, who also himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the perswassion & advice of Posthemiu, Minutim gave battell; and when as the conflict continued doubtfull untill it was far on the day , then Poft inmitte with his fresh legions, on a sudden charged the battaillons of the enemies, now already overroyled; t hus partly for wearinesse, and partly for wounds, they being difabled for to flee a way, were out of all meature flain every one, and xxi, banners were taken: and io from thence they went forward to the camp of Posthumina. Where thele two victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight; and wan from them xxvi. enfignes : where the General of the N Samnits Statius Cellius, with many a man befides, was taken priloner, and both their camps won-Boviannes also, which the morrow after began to be affaulted, was shortly after forced and finally with great glory of no noble acts atchieved, both Confuls triumphed Some write that the Confu Minntins being grievoully hurt, was brought back into the camp, and theredyed; and that M. Fulvius was fubilitured Conful in his room : and that it was he, who being fent unto the army of Minutins, Wan Boulanum. The lame year Sora, Arpinum, and Confentia were recovered from the Samnits : and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol fet up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpitius Averrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coll. the Samnits defiring elther to fee an end of war, or elie to delay it, fent Embaffadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom 6' as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given ; That if the Samnits had not 0 " to olten treated for pesce, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain enterwiews, and conferences passed between, obtein their mit : but fince that evermore untill that time, their words were but wind; now they would truft to their deeds, and nothing elfe. A upon the Conful when he departed out of Samnium. The fame year after that the Romans at my had passed by to and fro, and visited all Samnium, having victuals by the country counteonly allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Samnits. From thence turned the Romans their forces against the Equian, their old enemies; but for many years making semblance of quietness, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted : for that the Hernick nation was fafe and on foor, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to fend aid unto the Samnits; and also after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a maner without distembling, and averring all they did by publick counfell and authority, had fallen away unto the enemie : and after that the Romans had made league with the Samnits, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, It was but a tempting of them, to see. n whether upon fear of war they would fuffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be wish'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, choierather to live under their own laws, then to be entranchifed citizens of Rome; but others who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were conftrained to accept of the Burgeoise of their City, by way of a punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly toffed in their affemblies and Councels, the people of Rome decreed war against the Æquians : to which both the Consuls went, and encamped four miles from their enemiescamp. The Æquians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarell of theirs, had many years fat ftill and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a sudden and in hast, without certain Captains appointed, and without any Generall to command, were afficaid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp : most of them were moved to think aforehand upon the wasting of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities lest but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, as mongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick west and every man to regard his own privat state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals : they all with one accord accepted thereof, and imbraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day light, with banner displaied went forth into the field : and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order apace towards the enemies camp. But when as they could perceive there neither warders before the gats, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor fo much as the niuall noise of a leaguer; being moved with this unaccultomed filence, for fear of forelaying and treachery, they frood still : but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they fet forward to purine the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike : as being flipt here and there, fundry and divers waies; at the first they wandred out of the way, and missed of them; but afterwards knowing by their espials the purpole and intent of their enemies, they went round about and belieged every City, and in threescore dates wan forty towns all by assault a most part whereof were razed even with the ground, and confumed into after, and the nation of the Equians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Equians there was triumph; Whose calamity and desolation was to fearfull an example, to the Marrucins, Marsi, Peligni, and Ferentins, that they fent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flaviss a Notary or Register by profession, whole father Cness was no better than of a slave made free, a man, thus descended of bale and low parentage, howbeit otherwises crafty and e-loquent withall, arose to be an Ædise Corule. I find in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Ædiles, and faw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and electhim Ædile, but his name not accepted of among other competitours, for that hegot his living by his pen, he cast aside his books and papers, and sware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and ule pencraft. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumvirthips, the one for the night milrules, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very front, and in great contumacy oppoled himself and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great fecret by the Priefts, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad: and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calender, wherein all men might know worke-daies from holy-dayes; when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Also in despite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patricie, he dedicated the temple of the goddeffe Concord upon the Court of Valcan : and by the generall confent of the people, Cornelsus Barbains the high Priest was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain form of words therto belonging; not withstanding he contested and denied, that by the cultomes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unlesse he were either Conful or Generall of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was preferred to the people. That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permission and consent of the Conful, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of it felf not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and insolencie of the Nobles. This Flaving, coming upon a time to vifit his Collegue lying fick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentleman of the Patritians that fat by his bed fide, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one h io much as role up at entranceinto the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of State to be brought unto him, and fet him felf upon it; and to he outfaced his adversaries, that were fo vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity. This Flavius was nominated & cholen Adile. by the base faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of assemblies : who first took heart by the Cenforship of Appius Claudius the first that ever distained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he saw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawfull, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he fought for ; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base perions of the Commons : and to he corrupted both the common place and Mars field alio. In formuch as the Election of Flavins was reputed to unworthy an indignity, that most of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and enfigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One fide was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, fuch as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of tiffe-raffe and fcum of the City; untill the time that Q.F. bint and P. Decius were created Cenlors. Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withfland this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrats should not be carried away by the ftrong hand of the vileft and most abject perions, made a separation of all that base rabble, and cast them into four Tribes, and called them * Vrbane. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with so great contentment and thankfulnesse; that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purno lands in the chafed the intrame of Maximus, which in fo many victories he had not acquired and obtained, it country: all By him alio (by report) it was ordained and inflitted, that on the Ides of luly, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a folemn muster, and shewing their great hories to the Centor.

wo Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The marstans of Carleola, were reduced under obedience. The fellowship of the Augurs was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but fur. The law or edit as touching the appealing to the people, was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the rist, Anienfis and Terentine. War was denounced against the Samnits, and fortunally fought with them, What time at there was a battell given to the Tuscans, Umbrians, Samnits and Gauls, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger, P. Declus following the example of his father, devowed and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily, for to save the host: and by his death obtained the victory of that journy, to his countrimen and fellow Citizens, Papirius Curiot put to flight an army of the Sammits, who were bound by a folemn out houte depart out of the battel without victory, to the end, that with more magnanimity and resolution, they Should enter into the field. The Cense was held and the number taken of the Citizens, with the solemn purging and Lustration of the City. And assessed there were 262322 pols.

Hen L. Genutius and Ser. Cornelius were Confuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such fort, as they had leisure to place certains Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to afform the Equians. As for Sora, it had fometimes belonged to the Volicians territory; but the Samnits usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were fent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinats and Trebulans were infranchifed denizers at Rome. The Frufinats were fined with the loffe of one third part of their ands : for they were evidently detected to have follicited the Hernicks to rebelling on; and after that the Confuls Commission from the Senat, had made due inquisition; the principal heads of that compitacy, were fourged and beheaded, yet because there should not pass a yet elean without wir, a journy was made (such a one as it was) into Umbria; upon news, that there used to silve forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the comery about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their entignes displayed: where by traden that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of frones; untill such time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorow-fare.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and fet it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame defirous to escape, were imothered and burnt to affres.

When as M. Livius Denter, and C. Emplius, were Confuls, the Equians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as a frontier-fortress to bridle them, and assaied by all kind of force to win the same : but they were luftily repulfed by the Inhabitants only within the town Howbeit fuch a fear they made at Rome. because it was not thought credible, that the Equians alone of themselves, so distressed as they B were, would be so hardy as to take arms that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was flamed to wit C. Junius Bubulcus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Equians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Conful, and had putoutto workmen for to be builded, while he was Cenfor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Laced amonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thuria, a City of the Salentins. Against this enemy was the Conful Emplius fent, who in one battel discomfitted him, and drove him aboord. Thus Thuria was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness, I find in some Records, that it was Jun. Bubuleus the Dictator who was sent to the Salentins: and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compais, and doubled the point of Brundusium, and tailed with a fore-wind through the midit of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the Haven elsand harbourless coalls of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, fierce nations, and for the most part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying far within the shore, and there he landed a sew to discover the Coasts: but hearing that the strand that lay out against them was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plashes (as it were) overflowed with the fea-tides, and that not far off might be feen the champian fields near hand, and hils beyond; and discovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he saw, that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Meduacus) thither he commanded, that the Armada should put in, and to make fail up against the Aream. The heaviest vessels, the chanel of the river would not bear: but the souldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plain Country, frequented with much people, by reason that three sea towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a stender guard for their ships, they take Towns by affault, burnt houses, plunder and drive awayprizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetness of booty and pillage, they went far from their ships. The allarm hereof was given at Paravium (now the Patavins were alwaies in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers,) Wherupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led in-E to those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks forraged here and there all abroad: the other, because they would not meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ships rid (about fourteen miles from the Town. And after they had flain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the marriners were atraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they sped as well in fight against the stragling rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountred them afront, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midft, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had beflowed the prisoners sure enough in ward within the next village; some man with souldiers Ftheir river-vessels, made fitly and framed with flat bottoms, for to pass over the meets and shallow washes; others embark armed men in the imaligallions taken from the enemies; and made way apace to give an affault upon the main fleet, and befet those ships which rid at anchor, and durit not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. These, I say, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made haste to gain the deep and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for fear and haste were driven upon the shelves, and run a ground, then they returned with victory. Cleanymus hardly faved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coaft of the Adriatick fea, he departed. The flems of the fhips, with their beak-G heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Lacedamonians, were set up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have feen them. The memoriall of this fea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very fame day that it was fought) at Pataviam, with a solemn skirmish and combate of ships represented upon the river, within the midit of the

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vestins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers searfull occurrents. For news came, 288 that Herraria rebelled, which proubles took their beginning by occasion of the civill diffentiony and differd of the Arctins: who began to expell by force of arms the house and family of the Licinii (mighty and puissant above the rest) for very envy and repine of their wealth and eiches. Over and besides, the Marsians stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carfeolans brought, to the number of four thouland men, enrolled there to inhabit. Against which sirs and tumults, Marcin Valerius Maximus was created Distator, who made choice of M. Emylius Paulus to bethe Commander of the Horie. Which I rather beleeve to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under V. lerius. But I would not deny, that the errour might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfited the Marsians: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Miloniana, Plestina, and Freslin; within few daies, he wonthem also over their heads: and having fined the Marsians with the loss of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were emploied against the Tuscans: and whiles the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a forraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certainensigns, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul flaughter and shameful slight of his men. Which searfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, not only, because if ever he deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowels in war; but also, for that in remembrance of Papprins K his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This discomfiture and loss being reported at Rome, caufed a greater terrour than there was caule. For no less than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, warders be-Rowed at the gates, order taken for flanding watches in every fireet, and armour and darts carried up to the wals. And after that all the younger fort were sworn and prest to serve the Di-Chator was fent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for through the carefull dilligence of the Generall of Horle. The Camp was removed to a place of more ftrength and fafety, the bands and companies which had loft their enfigns, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, destitute of tents and covert; and the army eager and desirous of l fight, to do away and rate out the former ignominy and shame. Presently therefore, he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Rafella. Thither followed the enemies allo hard at heels; Who albeit upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and affiance, to be flrong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they affail the enemy also by the same fleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There fortuned to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houses half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had bestowed closely certain men in arms, they drave their beasts and cattel in the very sight of the Roman corps de guerd, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there firred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmenadvanced even under the very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for fear to drive but flowly from the ruins of the village aforefaid) asking why they staied behind, feeing they might fafely march, and paisforward flill (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Carits interpreted to the Lientenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of fouldiers took great indignation, but durst not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skilfull in the tongue to mark whether their language founded neerer to the speech of peasants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and also the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civil than for country shepherds. Go your waies then (quoth he)unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush, which in vain they feem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and N advertised of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms, When these words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they flatt up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their enfigns all abroad into the open field. The lieutenant supposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and matched by his corpi de guard, with all speed sent for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Distator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the souldiers to arm and sollows but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded : forthwith they caught up the enfigns and took weapon in hand : and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run amain. For not only the spitcful anger of the late received loss pricked them on, but aloo the shouts of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one putteth forward another, and crieth to the port-enfigns to go faster and mend their pace. But the more hastethe Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march and to hold them in ; willing them to go fair and foltly. Contrariwise the Tulcans, who rose up at the beginning of the battel, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge, Whereupon there came messenger after messerger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the

A legions of the Tuscans were entred into the fight, and that his men already were not able to resist anylonger. Nay himself also, from the higherground, might see in what danger the corps de quard was. But presuming and resting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, considering that he was not far off himself to help and save him out of perils he was desirous that the enemies might be wearied and tired asmuch as was possible, and that his ownforces fresh and in heart, should set upon them overtoiled. And albeit they went softly forward, yet by this time had the Horsemen but a very small ground to take their run with full career. Formost marched the enfigns of his legions, that the enemy should not fear any covert and privy stratagem, but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horses B might have room and liberty enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battaillon of the Infantry fet up a cry and shout when they charged, and withal, the Cavalry, with reins at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and set in order against such a bluftringstorm of Horlemen, were with a sudden fear assonied. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius which erewhile was in manner environed and compassed about, and had help and refuse almost too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For these that came fresh and lusty undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in difaray made hast to recover their camp. And when as the Romans advanced against them with banner displayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themselves round into heaps in the farthest part of the camp: and as they would have fled out, they fluck fast in the narrow gaps and passings of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the banck, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might deiend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the banck was not well rammed, the rampier was furcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to elcape, and by that means indeed they faved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battel, were the forces of the Tuicans once again utterly abated: in 10 much as, after they had capitulated and promifed a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to fend Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the D City. I find in some writers; that Hetruria was by the Dictator quieted, without any notable battel, only by composing the variance and debate of the Aretins, and reconciling the family of the Licinii with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consul. Some have believed that he was created without his ownsuit, yea, and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howfoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Confulship with Apilleius Panfa. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius were Coff, all was well quieted abroad : for the Tul-cans of one fide, partly upon their ill inceefs in war, and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be fill and in repose. The Samnits also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrows so many years together, repented not yet and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewife, the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of bale and poor people, which were withdrawn and fent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and period, there arose a quarel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the suggestion and infligation of Q, and Cn. Ogulmi, Tribuns of the Com. Who having fought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobility unto the Commons; when they saw all means assayed in vain, at length entred into an action, whereby they kindled and fet on fire not only the meanest, but even the chief heads of the Commons, such as had been Consuls, and triumphed: who wanted nopromotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They proposed therefore a Law, That whereas at that time Fthere were but 4. Augurs, and as many Prelats or Bishops, and for asmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be chosen to the rest, 4, Bishops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons, But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find : fince this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Rhamnenses, Titienses, and Luceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equal number increase those Priests: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as five being put to four, made up the number of nine; that is to fay, for every tribe three. Howbeit, because they were chosen out of the Commons who should supply, and make up the number; the Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulship parted equally in common: but they madesemblance as though this indignity perteined to the Gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be pollured. And as for them, this only they could do, namely, pray and wish, that no calimity thereby should light upon the common-weal. But less earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resistance, for that they were used already in all such broils and contentions to have the worfe and they saw besides, that their adversaries shot not at that (which in time past they could farce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obteined all, for which they had strived so long in so doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Consulats, Censorships, and Triumphs. Howbeir, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to H and no the law proposed, was mainteined (as men say) between Ap. Claudius especially, and P. Decius Mus: and after they had contested and discoursed in their Orations pro & contra, the fame reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which forectimes had been alleaged, both for, and against the law Licinia, at what time as P. Daviss Mus as it was fet on foot for the Commons to be Confuls; Decisis (as it is faid) represented in open audience the very resemblance and shew of his father, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at the assembly , had seen him : to wit, girded and apparelled in Gabine robe, standing over his javelin in which gesture, habit, and fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death, for to fave the people and legions of the Romans; "Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that I "then was Cof, as pure and religious in the fight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Maulius his col-" league had been likewise devowed and offered? and might not the same P. Decius have rightly "been chosen, to execute the publick divine service and sacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this "all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give less ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Clauding or "doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the Gods more re-"ligiously, than himself? Who was there ever that repented or missised of the vows, which to "many Confuls and Dictators of the Com. either at their first setting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief "Captains, year by year, fince the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and "conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever fince: it will appear that the Commons are K "no whit abashed, and have no cause to complain of their own nobility. And this I knowfor " (certain, that if any new sudden war should arise, the Senat and people of Rome would repose "no more hope and confidence in the ancient Pairitii, than in the Com. for to be the Captains " and Commanders. This being to, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to "adorn those persons also with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whom ye have "honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms " embroidred and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple, wrought with edivers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and "garland of lawrel; whose houses ye have beautified above the rest, with setting up the spoils of erenmies? Or who can think much, if he befeen with a facring cup, or holy-water pot, and with "acroifier staff, and his head vailed, either to kill a facrifice, or to take Augury by flight of birds "from the castle hill; who hath been adorned and decked with the enfigns and ornaments of the "great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in "whole Title, inscription and stile over his image, men shall with content, read Consulship, Cen-" forship, and Triumph; will not the same abide to see and read that ye have added thereuntoei-6 ther Augurship, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and "with reverence of the Gods be it ipoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are "fuch, as for our quality and worthine's, may and will yeeld no less credit and honor to our " Priest-hoods than we shall receive thereby : and who defire, in regard of the honor and service "of God, more than for our own takes and proper interest, to have the means, That whom well " ferve and reverence in private, those we may also worship and honor publickly. But why have "I hitherto to pleaded the cause, as if the Paritii were entirely alone intituled and invested in the " prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right "honorable and principal Priest-hood? We see that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, " and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophesies, and other the fatal destinies of this people, the "Prelats also and Ministers of Aposo his facrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Com-"mons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Patritit at that time, when for to gratify the "Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increased; those I mean, who should oversee (as " (uperintendents) the offering of a crifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to "complain, if the Tribun, a front and brave man hath added five places more of Augurs, and four " of Bishops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to disposses you of your rooms, " or to displace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might affilt you in the function and iministery of divine servi e and Church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good services and church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good services and church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as they do their part, and perform good services as the services as the part, and the services as the serv " vice inhuman and civil affairs. And be not ashamed O Appins, to have him for your colleaguein "the Priest-hood, whom you might beferm to have in Consulat or Cenforship, your companion " and fellow; unto whom being Dictator, you might be Collonel of Horse; as well as he to youin "your Dictatorship, Those ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their num-66 ber and order, a Sabine stranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. What? I my self can nominate already mine own father to have been a Conful, and " shortly shall my son be able to alledge his grandire. There is nothing else, O Quirites, in the " matter wheteupon westand, but that we may obtein all which hath been denied us. For the "Nobles defire only to maintain a fide and to contend, and care not greatly what iffue their "contentions come unto. As for me, I do advise, and this would I have, That (to the good pro-" fit, and happy estate of you all, and the weal publick) this law may pals under your affirmative "voyce [Miros affis.] Then presently the people commanded the Tribes to be called to a f. ruti-B ny: and foon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was lost, by the opposition and negative of some Tribuns. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to crois it; and then with exceeding conient of all hands it passed cleer. So there were created Prelats or Bishops; first, P. Decius Mus himself (that to pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Ruttlius, and M. Livius Denter. Likewife, five Augus of the Commons, to wit, C. Genutius, P. Ælius Patus, M. Minutius Festus, C. Martius, and T. Publius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Augurs.

The lame year, M. Valerus the Coniul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more furely to be established and confirmed. This was now the third time after the deposition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and al wayes by the same house or samily of the Valerii. The C cause of renning the same so often, was no other I suppose, than this; for that the mightiness of some sew great men of the Patritii, was more powerful than the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portia, seemeth to have been enacted for to fave the back and sides of Citizens from whipping, because that it awarded and set a grievous punishment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbad, to scourge or behead any man wholoever, that made his appeal, had this annexed only, that if any one had trefpaffed and proceeded farther, it should be decreed, Leandly and naughtily done. Such was the modelty and reverence of men in those dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was suppoied to be a sufficient bond to strengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man scarcely threaten his fervant or flave in that manner.

The same Consul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, against the Equians that rebelled; who (fetting afide their front and proud fromacks) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and effate. The other Coff. Apulerus, beneged the Town * Nequinum in Umbria. The . The fame place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one fide fleep down right (whereas now flan-that Nania, deth Narnia) fo that it was impregnable either by affault, or countermures and sconces what soever. Whereupon, the new Confuls, M. Fulvius Parus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entred upon this enterprise, left undone and unfinished by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voyce Q. Fabius for the Consulfhip of that year, even without his own suit and seeking; Macer Licinius and Tubero do write, that he himself laboured to have that charge put off, and referved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the prefent he would serve the Common-weal in better flead, by bearing some civil office in the City: and so neither diffembling what he rather defired, nor yet feeking for it, he was made Ædile of the Chair, with L. Papirius Curfor. But, to let this down for a certain truth I dare not; because that Pifo, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, faith, that the Ædiles Curule of that year, were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calvinus, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That furname, I suppose verily, gave occasion of the error in the Ædiles. Whereupon enfued a tale (forting to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Ædiles and Confuls together. The same year was held a solemn survey and purging of the City by facrifice, called Lustrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Averrio, and two Tribes more were added to the rest, Aniensis; and Tarentina. And thus much concerning the affairs at Rome.

But now to return to Nequinum; after much time spent in long and lingting siege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whose houses joyned close to the wall, undermined the ground, and by a fecret way came as far as the corps do guard of the Romans. From whence they were brought before the Conful, and promised him to let in and receive what garrison and troop of armed men he would, within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refused, nor yet rashly to be credited. So with the one of these twain (for the other was kept behind as an hostage) two other spies were sent by the same mine to discover the train. By whose relation, when it appeared infliciently, that all was fafe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforefaid, 300 armed men by night entred the City, & seized that gate which was next unto them: at which being broken open, the Conful and the Roman army without refiftance, made entry, and G surprised the City. In this fort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thither tent to Frontier against the Umbrians, called of the * Rivers name [which * Nav, now No. runneth under it | * Narnia. And the army with a rich prize was brought again to Rome.

The same year the Tuscans, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But whiles they were builty occupied otherwise, it fortuned, that a puissint army of Gauls invaded their marches, and for a while altered their defignments. Afterwards, by the means of mony whereof they were full and bare themselves mighty, they sought to make the Gauls, of enemies to become their friends, and follicited them to band together, and so jointly to maintain war with the Romans. Their iociety and friendship the barbarous people refused not; only, H they flood upon the fum what they should have for their hire, Which being agreed up on and received, and all things else in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tukans willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any confideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatfoever they had taken, it was became they should not wast the Tuican Land, and by way of hollility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: how beit, if the Tuscans were to minded to employ them, they would be willing to terve; but for no other reward and recompense, than to be admitted into port of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuican, but nothing relolved and concluded: not to much, I for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbours, descended from fo lavage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and chimified, having away with them a huge mals of mony, which they got without any travel or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and infurrection, together with the Tuscans war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more hall was made to conclude a league with the * Picene people. T. Manlius the Conful had the charge of the Tukan war allotted unto him. Who feartely was entred into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercifing amongst the Hor emen he ran his Horse with tall carier, and seddenly as he turned about, was catt off, and prefently lay for dead : and so the Conful, three dayes after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuicansk taking hold of, as a good ominous token and prefage got heart and were very jolly; faying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a perionage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the affembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) forto substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frighted the Senators from chufing a Dictator. All their fentences, and all the centuries gave with M. Valerius to be Conful: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have pricked for Di-Stator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tulcany to the army. Whose coming suppressed and kept under the Tuscans; to as not a man dust once go out of their trenches and hold, Even their very fear was as good as a fiege unto them: for that the new Conful neither by walting the fields, nor firing their houses in such fort, as every where, not only the small villages, but alloL the good and wel-peopled Towns were seen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forthto

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another; (which, confidering the mutual losses of both fides, was for good causes greatly to be seared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnits were about to take arms and rebel, and had follicited them also to do the same. The Picentes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tufcany to the Samnits. The dearth besides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extream famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Ædile that year) by provident purveighing and diligent conveighing of corn, had not been as careful and M industrious, in the dispensing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The fame year there was an Interreign, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Interregents were App. Claudius and after him P. Sulpitius, who held an Election of Confuls, and created L.

Cornclius Scipio and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnits, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entred into their confines, and made wast of the "country, and by very force provoked them to war, faying, That the Lucans had long ago over-" fhot and passed themselves that way: but now they were so sully resolute, that they could "find in their hearts fooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatloever, than everafter N to offend and displeate the Roman name. They belought the Senat therefore, to receive the "Lucans into their protection, and all o to keep and defend them from the violence and linjury of "the Samnits. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnits, they were of necessity bliged to be fast and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to put in 10th ientholiages. The Senat was not long confulting hereabout: but all with one con ent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to fummon the Samnits tomake amends and reflitution. The Lucans, belides a courteons and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fecial Heralds dispatched to the Samnits, to give them warning for to depart the ter. itory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnits fent out certain messengers to meet them upon the way, and 0 to denounce unto them, that if they prefented themselves in any Councel within Sannium, they should not depart again with lafeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senat advited, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnits. The Confals parted their Provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Hetruria, and the Samnits to Fulvius: and io they take their journey divers wayes, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and

A arranged, encountred him and gave him battel neer to * Volaterra; where they fought the better * Volterra part of the day, with much blood hed on both fides: and whiles they were doubtful which way the victory went, the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were lolers. For the Tuscans in the Rill and dead time of the night dislodged. The Roman Conful coming forth into the field, and feeing by the enemies daparture, the victory confessed; went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men, but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great haft abandoned their tents) and was mafter thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territory of the Fali cans: and after he had left at Falerii, all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a Brunning camp wasted the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drave away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wast and defart, but set fire also upon Cattles and borrough Towns. Only he forbare to affault the great and strong Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscans for refuge. Cn. Fulvius the Consul on the other part fought 2 noble battel in Sannium, neer * Bovianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which * Boisnot heaffailed Bovianum, and not long after Aufidena: and both Cities he wan by force. The fame year was there a Colony brought to "Carfeloi within the territory of the Aquiculi. And Fulvi- * Arceolo. us the Conful triumphed over the Samnits.

When as now the time of the Confuls Election drew neer; there was a rumour raifed, that the Tulcons and Samnits were levying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that openly in all their C Assemblies and Diets, the Princes of the Tuscans were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war, whatfoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Samnits were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own powers and also with the help of their allies, were come to war; they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons flood to be Confuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourits of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affe-Ations, refused also to be Consul. "Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so "aged a man as he was, and one, who as as he had gone through all labours and travels of this o world; so he had passed also the rewards, and recompences of his travels: alledging, that nei-"ther frength of body, nor vigor of spirit could alwayes continue the same, and last for ever: and "befides, he feared fortune her felf, left haply the might be thought of any of the Gods too pro-" picious and favourable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himfelf had grown up after the glory of his elders, "and succeeded them; so he saw and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and "to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advance-"ments for hardy and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those "honors and dignities. But by this refusal of his so modelt so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which he thinking to dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read. wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Consultwice. But scarcely for the noise that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribuns of the Com. laid, that this should be no let: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed withal from the Statutes in that behalf, Howbeit hestood tisfly ftil in his refulal: demanding of them to what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very makers thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For fo (qd, he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheleis, the people went to a ferutiny and began to give their voyces: and as every Century was called into the rails, they named and chofe Fabius Conful, without flicking arthe matter. Then at last, overcome with this general accord and consent of the whole City: God fay Amen (quoth he) O Quirites, to that you do and are about. But for af-"much as you wil have your wil and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this savour yet, that I may have the chuning of my Colleague. I beleech you make Conful with me, P, Decius, a man ap-"proved unto me already, with whom, I have forced well in the fellowship of another office: 2 "man I say, answerable otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his sathers vertue, from whom he is descended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decius for Confuls.

The same year the Ædiles served process upon very many Citizens; for holding and posfessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquit himfelf hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the new Confuls . Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnits, and the other the Tulcans; and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province and exploit; and to whether war either of them were the more meet and sufficient Leader; certain Embassadors, from Sutrium, Nepet, and Falerii, advertised them, That the States of Tulcanie, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Samnium. The Cohins being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and

Victuals, and the enemy be more to feek, which way they would affail them, led their Legions H into Samnium; Fabius, through the tetritory of Sora, and Decius by the way of the Sidicins, When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them spred themselves all abroad, and fell to forrage and spoil the country : yet so, as they fent out their espials farther than they walled Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close and secret valley neer Tifernum; what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to fet upon the Romans to toon as they were on centred in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a fure place, and fet there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his fouldiers that there was a battel towards: and in a four-square battaillon marched directly to the forfaid Embascado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnits then, despairing and I out of all hope to do any great exploit, by sudden tumult, considering their trains were discovered; and feeing they must once at the length come to the tryal in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a fet battel. Thereupon they descended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had affembled together the whole flour and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnits, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardy and take the better heart: furely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius seeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had fet forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horsemen, and to exhort them, If ever they remembred and called to mind, that the K Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horseback, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For feeing that the enemies floed unmoveable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen: and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plyed both the one and the other with like courtefy; one while praising them, another while loding them with fair and large promifes. But when as the affay of that force likewife, prevailed not, thinking where firength would take no place, there craft was to be tryed and practifed, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javeliniers of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills ; and then, to march up the hill some way from the fight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a suddento L shew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horfemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a indden before the standards, troubled their own fellows almost asmuch as the enemies. For against these troops and corners of Horfe that thus violently put forward, the Samnits battel food unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Hossemen when they faw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the entigns, and departed out of the battel. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the wanguard of the Romans been able to abide fo long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encreasing, upon their own confidence, but that the fecond ranges in the middle ward, by the Conful his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Wherethey with their fresh frength, N flayed the Samnits, being now ready to enter forceably upon them, and to gainthe ground: and withal, at the time appointed, the enigns shewed themselves from the hills, and came down unawares to the enemies; and letting up a frout not only daunted the hearts of the Samnits but alfo encouraged the Romans, For both Fabius cryed aloud, that his Colleague Decim approached, and every fouldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Conful was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and mistaking, as it turned to the good of the Romans, so it caused the Samnits to flie, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged allo with fresh and lusty forces, And for that in their running every way, they were scattered asunder, there was less flaughter than for the preparation of so great a victory, For 3400 N obly were flain, and of prisoners were taken, welneer three hundred and thirty; and three and twenty bonners and enfigns won and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Samnits before the battel, but that P. Decius the Conful encamped against them at Malevenium, and having drawn them forth to fight, discomfitted them. Where also there were more than fled, than diedupon the fword: for not above 2000 Apulians were flain. And Decisis making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Samnium. Where, two Confular hofts, having over-run the country in divers parts, within five months space laidall, wast and desolate. Five and torty places there were in Samnium, where Decine had encamped; and eighty fix, wherein the other Conful had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of Rakes, rampires, and ditches, but also many other more notable figns and tokens of the country wasted all about,0 and utterly spoiled by them. Fabius besides, won the City Cimetra. Where there were taken priloners two thousand and sour hundred armed souldiers, and slain there were in fight upon

From there he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls, and made all the halb could to dispatch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their single of the frage 75 med Q. Fabius for the Consuls then Appius Claudius 2 Consuls man, and one of the Competitors, a grim sir, and ambitious by nature laboured no more for his own honour and advancement,

A vancement, than to recover again unto the Patricis, both the rooms of the Confulthip, and employed as well his own devoir, as also all the means and affitiante of the Parritii and Nobility, to have hmiself chosen Consul with Q. Fabins. As for Fabins, at the first, pake and alledged in his own be half, the same reasons in manner which he had used the former year, and reinsed to be Conful. The whole body of the Nobility stood about his feat, praying instantly, and entreating him to pluck the Confulship out of the mire and base degree of these Commons, and to restore the ancient Majelly both to the Magiltracy it felf, and also to the Paritin and their houses and families. Fabius after filence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of speech, whereby he appealed and allayed their hot affection, promiting and affuring them, that he would willingly ac-B cept the names of two of the Nobility, if he might iee, that they would create any other Conful but himself: for at this present Election, he would in no wise admit himself, to be eligible and nominated Conful, and give to bad a precedent to prejudice all course of law, for the time to come. So L. Volumnius, out of the body of the Commons, was created Contul with App. Claudius, who likewise in the former Consulship had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility used to object unto Fabins, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a fingular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Confuls were commanded to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commission renued for fix months. And so in the year following likewise, when L. Volumnius and Appius Claudius were Consuls, P. Decim, C who being Conful, had been left behind his Collegue in Samnium, ceased not now in quality and name of Proconful, to wast the country; until at length, when the Samnits would in no place abide battel, they were by him chased out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded our of their own country, they went into Hetrurss. Where, supposing that with so huge a multitude of armed men, they should do that more effectually with intreaty and prayers, mingled with threats among, which by so many Embassiages they had so oft attempted in vain; they called for a Diet and general Councel of the States and Princes of Hetraria, "Which being affembled, they declared and shewed, for how many years space they had main-" tained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had affayed all means, if " haply they might have been able by their own puissance alone, to sustain and support the weight D " of so huge and important a war: that they had besides made proof of the aids of other neigh-"bour nations, but to little effect; that they had fought for peace of the people of Rome, when "they were not able to wage war any longer: and because peace was more grievous unto them "with that subjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and " now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuscans: knowing wellenough, that for men-"munition, and mony, they were the mightiest nation of all Italy; as having to their neighbours sthe Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural disposition fierce and ctuel, "but especially in any quarrel against the people of Rome: of whom they do (and not untruly re-"port) that they were by them vanquished and constrained to ransome themselves for gold. Now, if the Tulcans were of that heart and courage, as Porfeua fometimes, and other their nos ble progenitors were: there were no doubt, but that they might diffeize the Romans, and dif-"polless them of all the ground on this fide Tybris, and make them fight for the defence and pre-" fervation of their lives, and not for the intollerable feignory and dominion of Italy. They faid "moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnits, well appointed and fur-"nished with armour, and stored with pay and mony, who would fellow them forthwith, even "to the assault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

Whiles they were thus braving, and gloriously boatling themselves, and preparing of war in Tuscanie, the Romans war at their own dores, lay fore upon them, and stung them at the heart. For P. Decius having learned by the espials, that the Samnits army was gone forth, and had taken their voyage, affembled a Councel and faid, What mean we thus to range over the fields, warring from village to village? And not rather affail the walled Towns and strong Cities? There is no army now, that defendeth Samnium: gonethey are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to assure the found of the frong City Margantia. And so hotely were the souldiers set, both for the love they bare to their Captain, and also for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by driving booties out of the country, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thousand and one hundred Samnits, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the fword, or were taken prisoners, with a great and rich booty besides. But for searthat it should furchage and encumber the army with heavy carriages, Decim cauled his fouldiers to be called to-gether unto an audience, and thus to them he faid. "And will ye fland contented indeed with" this victory only, and this prey? Or will ye build your hope till, answerable to your prowels "and valour. All the Cities of the Samnits, all the substance and riches that lieth and remaineth "in their Cities are yours for almuch as ye have in so many battels vanquished their legions, and "at last driven them out of their own country. Sell these prizes, and with hope of gain draw after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time still help you to "wares and commodities for to fell, Let us go from hence streight to the City Romulea, where "your toil shall not be so great, but the spoil far greater. So when they had made sale of their pillage, and willingly of themselves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Romulea they go. Where likewise, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of H battery, so soon as they advanced their enfigns, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but fet up ladders in all halt, at the next place that every man could. find, and so scaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ransacked. To the number of 2300 were flain, and 6000 taken priloners. The fouldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to fell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulnes. Howbeit, there they found more difficult and perilous service : for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place it felf was both by mans hand, and natural fituation, furely fenced: but yet the fouldiers now being fleshed, and enured to spoil, overcame all difficulties. Three l thousand men about the walls were sain; and the saccage fell to the souldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in affaulting and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabiu Maximus. Forthey write, that Murgamia was by Decius won, but Ferentinum and Romulea, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereof unto the new Consuls. And then are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volumnius, unto whom befell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skils not) in the mean time a mighty war was a preparing in Hetruria; and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellins Egnatius a Samnit. The Tufcans, in manner al, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neer fociety, caused also the people of Umbria ad K joyning to take their part : befides, Gauls also were waged for mony to aid : all which multitude affembled together, and met in the Samnits camp. The news of which fudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome; for fornuch as P. Volumnius the Cof. with the second and third legions, and with 1 5000. confederats, was gone already into Samnium; it was thought good and determined, that App. Claudius with all speed possible, should go into Herruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thouland allies; who encamped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came this ther betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Herraria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skilfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Conful. Many skirmifhes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at times unconvenient; in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welneer to this point, that neither fouldier could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain, nor Captain trust upon the loyalty of the souldier. In three several Annals I find , that Appine dilpatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and sent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to let this down, being so uncertain as it is; seeing that the very Confuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contested, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied flatly that he sent any script at all, and Volumnius again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius his his letters, Volumnius by this time had wonthree Castles in Samnium, wherein were slain three thousand enemies, and almost hali so many taken prisoners: and composed besides the seditions and quarrely of the Lucans, which arole from the Commons and needy perions; and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabine the Proconful, who was thither sent with the old army. This done, helest Decision to wast and pill the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who athis first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appins had good cause to cary an angry flomack with him, in case his conscience bare him witness, that he wrote not unto him: for gain, if he had need of his Colleagues aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would to diffemble, and not be known thereof. For being come forthor meet him, before they had well greeted and faluted one another, How now, quoth he, O.L. Vell lumnius, is all well? How goes the World in Sannium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volumnius made answer, that in Samnius all things went well and chieved prosperously, and that himself was now come, as sent for by his letters: Which if they were counterfeit, and that there were no need of him in Hetruria, he would presently turn his entigns, and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you you may be gone when you will, and no man holdeth you: and ill befeeming it is, that you who paradventure are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, should glory thus, and make your boaft that you are come hither to help others, Hereat, Volumnius (hould reply again and lap It is well, and God fend us good luck: I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have have ned, whereby one Confuls army were not fufficient to deal with Herruria. Now as the Confuls () were parting afunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appins his army came and flood round about them both: "fome requested their own General, that the aid of his Col-"league which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required 5 now that it was "offred to willingly, and of his own accord, should not be refused and rejected. But the more "part encountred Volumnius, as he was ready to go his way, and earneftly befought him not for any froward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common-weal, Forti "any overthrow or miladventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the for-

"faker than the fortaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of "the war in Herruria, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volumnius : for that no man would "enquire of the words and language that Appinigave him but of the fortune and fuccels of the ar-"my: and albeit Appins had given him his farewel and pasport, the weal publick and the army held "him still by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make tryal of the fouldiers hearts and "affections. Thus with remonstrances perswasions, and hearty prayers to the one Conful and the other, they drew them both in manner against their will to pariy in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discourses, but to the same purpose and effeet, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volumnius (as having the better B cause seemed to reply and that with good grace & words enough, against that singular elogience of his Colleague; and that Appins in frumping and taunting manner, gave out and faid, That they were beholden to him and might con him thank, that of a dumb and tongue-tied Conful they had one now, that was fo ready and eloquent and who in his former Confulthip, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator, and able to make plaufible and popular Orations: then replied Volumnius and faid, "Would "God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then I of you to speak "finely: and in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which thould determine and put "out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this " present the Common-weal stood not in need of such) but the better warrior and Captain Gene-"ral. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Herraria and Samniam, it shall be in your choice ''(qd, he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I my felf will with my own army, make war "in the other. Then began the fouldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter "both upon the Tulcan war, Which consent and accord of theirs, when Volumnius had perceived, "For almuch (qd, he) as I have once miltaken and milinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I wil of not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a "fhout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they let up fuch a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raifed them out of their camp; and prefently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field, Volumnius likewise caused the trumpets to found, and the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad. Then Appins (as it is reported) seeing plainly that whether he fought or fate fill, the victory would be ascribed to his Colleague, flood in a mammering and suipen'e for a while: but afterwards fearing, left that his own legions also would follow Volumnius, gave likewife unto his menthe fignal of battel, which they so instantly called for. But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnits (Gallius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him; whereupon the fouldiers rather of their own head, than by conduct and direction of Captains began to charge and alfothe Roman armies were not both lead forth together nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volumnius first gave the charge before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefronts were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withal; the Tulcans presented themselves to Volumnius and the Samnits who stayed awhile (for that their General was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was seen in the front of the formost ensigns, to liftup his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wife, "OLady Bellona, if thou give us victory, and the honor of this day then, be fure, I vow here unto "thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddels had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himself matched the valour of his Colleague, and his army answered the vertue of their Commander. For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave General. The fouldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavoured and streined all that ever they could; Whereby, they disarayed, discomsted, and put to flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than Fthey were wont to meet withal. And so with pressing hard upon them still that retreated, and chaing them hody that were frattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellins and the Sabellian bands, the battel for the time was f, effily renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfitted, then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus whiles Volumnius for his part entred with banner displayed unto the very gate and Appius ever and anon, reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and instame the courage of his fouldiers; there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and facked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the fouldiers. Seven thouland and three hundred enemies were flain, 2120 taken priioners.

During the time that both Confuls, and the whole puffance of the Romans, were thus more bent and imployed in the war within Tuicany; there were new forces railed in Samaium, to walt the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vestins, into Campanis and the country of Faleria, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Volumnius by great journies returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their prorogued government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnits army and their forraging of the territory of Capua; turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confeder rais. So foon as he was entred into the country Calenum, both he himself saw the fresh marks and tokens of great dammage and desolation; and also the Calenians advertised him, that the enemies caried with them already to exceffive a prey and boory, that they were icarce able for it to march in good order, and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the belt course they could take, was presently to retire Samnium, there to leave their prizes and bocties and so to return affesh to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, so laden and furcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battel. Which words, albeit they jounded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a liner ground, and therefore he fent certain light Horiemen, to intercept lome forragers as they fireled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much questioning with them, that the enemies encamped by the river Vulturms, and from thence at the third watch, would fet forward on their journey directly into Samnium. Atter he had fufficient intel-l ligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way and encaniped fo far from the enemies, as his approach by being too neer could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprise them as they should issue in disorder out of their camp, So4 good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and fent fuch as were well feen in the Ofcian tongue, to liften and learn what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garboil and consustion) they found that the ensigns were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelefly, like a fort of vike and base lozels, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetels time to let upon them: and now it drew neer day. Whereupon he commanded the trumpers to found the charge, and fet upon the march of the enemies. The Samnits, incumbred as they were, and peffered with their boory, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace and to march fafter away, and drive before them the booty: some flood fill, and will not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But whiles they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnits as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loofe, loofed also those that were bound : whiles others of them, caught up their wes-] pons which were fastned to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, madea greater and more fearful garboil and havock, than the very battel of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable Act above the rest. For as Statius Egnation the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the fouldiers to fight, they fet upon him, scattered the Horsemen asunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he sat on Horseback, and haled him to the Roman Consul. Upon which tumuk and flir, the formost ensigns of the Samnits were called back, and the battel which in manner was done, now began airesh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slain there were about fix thouland; two thouland and five hundred taken priloners. Amongst whom, were 4 Colonels and 30 Enfigns: and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 M and 400 hundred were again recovered; with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretenda right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challer ged by the true owner, was given away to the fouldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any

This faccage of the territory of Capua, had railed great trouble and sir in Rome. And at the very fame time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Herraria how that upon the withdrawing of Volumnius his forces out of those parts, all that country was up afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnit Captain, and the Umbrians likewife, were moved to revole; and the N Gauls also follicited with great sums of mony. At this bruit the Senat being affraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of term, and that all forts of men should be mustered : and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworn, but * cobstituit, is of certain a companies also of the elder fort, yea, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were inrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Councel about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat wis partly eased and discharged of this care by the letters of L. Volumnius the Coi, which gave intelligence that the forragers of Campain were defeated flain and put to flight. Thereupon were decreed in favour of the Conful, for this exploit by him atchieved, folemn proceffions, and the abilinence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen dayes space: and the proteto fion aforefaid, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devile about garriions fordefence of the country thus wasted and overrun by the Samnits, And agreed it was, that two Colonies should be sent about the Vestin and Falern coasts: one to the mouth of the river Liris, which Colony was called " Minturna the other in the Vestin forrest and streights, adjoyning to the Falern country; where Synope, a Greek Town sometime flood, and afterwards was called by the * Sinussa, vel Romans there inhabiting, * Sinussa. The Tribuns of the Com, had in charge to ordainby an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain TriumA virs, about the fending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much ado they had to find those that willingly yeelded to be inrolled Coloners, supposing indeed that they were fent thither, not to inhabit Land and ground for their belt behoof, but to lie in garrison, and to fland upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually moletted by war like enemies. From the care of these affairs, the Senat was withdrawn, by occasion of the Tutcans war, whereof the rumour daily encreated: and letters also came thick from Appines, who warned them not to neglect the rifing of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themselves together; to wit, Tuscanie, Samnium, Umbria, and the Gauls; that they were already encamped in two places for that one was not able to receive to great a multi-B tude. Upon these occasions, as also for that the time drew neer of Election of Confuls, Lucius Volumnius the Consul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voyces, having affembled the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatness of the Tuscan war. "How that afore time, when he himse f and his brother Conful warred there together, it was of to great importance, that neither one lea-"der, not yet one army was sufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, and a mighty power of "Gauls were afterward combined unto them. So that they should remember, that they were to "chule that day two Coff. against four Nations. As for himself, but that he was certainly per-"fivaded and affored, that the people of Rome would with a general confent declare him Coff. "" who at that time, without all controversie was counted the principal Captain and belt leader of C"all others, he would forthwith nominat a Dictator. No man doutted, but the Q Fabrus was the man, who by the affent of ail, was meant and deftined to this charge; and him together with Volumnius, both the prerogative tribe, and all those that were called first, every one, nominated to be Coff, Fabius made a speech by way of excuse, in substance, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards feeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his collegue: " Alledging, that he would be in stead of a good prop and stay to him in his old age: how he had found by expe-"rience in one Centorthip and two Confulthips, born jointly together with him, that there was "no furety and defence of the Common-weal, to the concord and agreement of those that are com-"panions in government. And to any other new Collegue bendes him, hardly could an old mans D " mind fore and frame. Also that he would and could more easily impart his mind and purpose to "one, whole humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Coff. himself confirmed his Oration, and accorded thereunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deferts of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the managing of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Confuls; and of the hurt which happed and followed upon their diagreement and diffention: "and therewith he shewed how neer they were " of late to utter peril and destruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appins; "admonishing Decius and Fabius both to live so, as with one mind and heart they affected and intended the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of Action both, born for " war and to be fouldiers; for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contentions E " of words and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilful, and fuch natures , (faid he "were fittelt to make Confuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply feen in points and "quircks of law, full of their eloquent tearms, fuch as Ap. Claudius was; those were meet to be "made Lord Presidents of the City and chief Justices in the common place, for to st in judgment " of causes, ard see the execution of laws. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent, The morrow after, according to the Confuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Confuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Confuls, and App. Claud us Pretor, all absent. And L. Volumnius by Act of the Senat, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The same year were many strange sights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away Fof the dangers forefignified and menaced thereby, the Senat decreed supplications and Letanics for two dayes together. Wine and incense for the sacrifices, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the Holy shrines, and there to do their devotions. These solemn supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Pudicitia Parritia, which standeth in the beast-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Virginia the daughter of Aulus, who, not with standing the was nobly descended from the race of the Patritii. yet had espouled Volumnius the Consul, a Commoner, and was mirried (sortooth) out of the family and ranck of the Patritii. Whereupon, there began some short and cutted shrewd G words to be dealt between: and so (as women commonly are soon angry and set on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia alledged and faid that the being a Gendewoman and Patritiaborn, and a chaft and honest Dame, was entered in the Chappel of Patritian Chastities: over and besides, she had not been noted for Bigamy; but was the wife of one only husband, unto whom the was given and brought a pure maid: and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had atchieved, she had no cause to complain, or be ashamed, nav rather, she gloried therein right greatly. After this, she accumulated these magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave a deed. For in the long fireet where she dwelt, she set by and cut off a part of her dwelling house, as much as would h ferve for an Oratoy or pety Chappel, and there erected an Altar. And when the had affembled the wives of the Commoners together, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Patritian dames; "This altar (quoth she) do I dedicate unto Pudicina Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, "that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this City contend about feats of valour "and arms, who may do best; so likewise the Matrons and wives strive and excel in continence "and chassity; and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to be "frequented, and reforted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if (it be possible) of "more chaft women, than that other of the Nobility. And so it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was more antient: in such fort, as no wife, but of approved honefly and chastity, and wedded butto one husband during her life, might be allowed there to facrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and infitution, in lapse and process of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were flained and infamous , and not only by matrons of name and quality, but also by women of all forts and degrees, until at last through disuse it grewto be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The same year the Ædiles Curule, Cn, and Q. Ogulius accused certain Usurers, who were convisted, and their goods forfeir and confiscar. And of that which came into the common chell, they can'ed to be made a brasen portal in the Capitol, and filver vessels forto furnish out three tables in Inpiter his Chappel: also the image of Jupiter himself in the Lantern or frontifice of the I Capitol setting in his chariot drawn with four fleeds. Moreover, at the Fig-tree Ruminalis, they erected and tet up the images of the foundling babes, the first founders of the City, pendant at the teats of a shee-wolf. They paved also with square stone, the causey and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ædiles likewife Commoners, L. Ælins Parm, and C. Fulvim Curvus, of the forfeited mony which they levied of the grafiers or farmers of the City passures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pageants and playes, and set up golden bolles in the Temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabrus the fift time Conful, and P. Decius the fourth, entred their government, who now had been companions together in three Confulats, and in one Cenforthip, mentnowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than foll their loving agreement and concord. Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by oc cafion I suppose, of the contention of the States that came between, rather than of any different betwist themselves. For the Parritu laboured, that Fabius should have the Province of Tulcan extreordinarily: and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to put the matter to a Lotter, Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, seeing that Fa bius was able there to do more and make a greater fide than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which affembly, few words passed between the parties themselves, being martial men both , standing more upon deeds than words. Fabins gave out and faid; "That it was an indignity, that another should gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted "Also, that himself was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and hady er given entrance and passage for the Roman war, through desart and wild forrests. What mean "they then to trouble him, a man of those years, with this place of charge, in case, they minded "to give the conduct of this war to any other General but himself? No doubt, but by littlead "little he upbraided them covertly and cast in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversary, and "not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the "good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magistracies already, "Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so be, they thought him "worthy of the Province, thither to fend him. For as he had been at the appointment and pla-"fure of the Senate, so would be be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other "fide , P. Decius complained of the injury offered by the Senat : for that the Nobles had ender N "youred to their power, and done their best that no Commons might have access to honourable " places and dignities: and after that prowels and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed " so, as even in those kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour; there were " means fought, that not only the voyces of the people were deluded and made vain; but allo "the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleasures of some "few. All Consuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their absolute " authority, without caffing lots, gave unto Pabin the charge of his province. If it be faithbe) "to honour the man: verily, he hath so well deserved both of my self and of the Common. "wealth, that I favour highly and tender the glory of Q. Fabius; provided alwayes, that ited "not a shining lustre, by a foil of my disgrace and dishonour. And who will ever doubt, where there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the same precisely and absolutly charged upon "one Conful, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Conful standeth for "Cipher, and is reputed either needless, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he glorid "in his service and noble Acts archieved in Tuscan, even so would Publius Decius also inlling do the semblable: and peradventure, he should be able to put out and quench that fire oncefor "all, which Fabur left behind him, focovered and raked up. as that oftentimes it fuddenly brake " out again, and yeelded forth new flames and blazes. In conclusion, he could be contented

" yeeld the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Collegue, in the reverent regard A "yeeld the actes of the actes of the actes of this perfon: but for any hazard or jeopardy that might be pre-"sented unto them, he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to 46 him or any man elie whatloever; and if he gat no other good by this contention, yet would he " obtain thus much at the least, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that abso-"Intly at their discretion, which was intheir power; rather then permit the Nobles to gratifie "any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Jup, Opt, Max, and all the im-"mortal gods, that even as they vouchfafed to bestow upon him and his Collegue equal valour "and happiness in the conduct of their war, so they would afford them one and the same right B "and authority and rule. For, furely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and " profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that such should be Confuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the war with the "Tuscans might be administred as it ought to be. Fabius then, having befought the people naught elle, but that before the Tribes were called into give their suffrages, they would hear the letters of App. Clanding Pretor read, which were brought out of Tuf any, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tufcany, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabine, with no less consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon, all the younger fort (in manner) ran unto the Conful, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so desirous were they to serve under that Captain. Which multitude being thus slocked about him Cround; Four thouland footmen (quoth he) and fix hundred horfe, and no more, am I minded to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will prefent themfelves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of fouldiers to fight my battels. Thus went heforth with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good faccels, by how much less he flood upon the great number; and directed his journey to the Town Abarna, where Appins the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the fewellers or wood-purveiors, accompanied with a good guard of fouldiers for their convoy, met him: who feeing the Sergeants going before, and understanding that it was Fabius the Conful, with joy and cheerful hearts, thanked God and the people of Rome, for sending unto them such a General, After this, when they came all about the Conful to falute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whither they went? who answered, To purvey wood and fewel. Say ye fo? (quoth he) and have ye not your camp empaled and fortified ? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double tampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quoth he) ye have wood and timber enough; Go ye back again, and down with the trench and pallilade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampart, they gave the alarm both to the fouldiers that tarried behind in the camp, and to Appius himlelf, and made them afraid. Then every man faid to one or other as they came, that it was by the express commandment of Q. Fasius the Consul that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp; and Appin the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome. After which time, the Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he said, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more wholfom both for the agility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the foil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet palt,

In the beginning of the Spring, Eabius having left the fecond legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Pro-pretor to begovernor of the camp, he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before; or that he was fent for by order from the Senat; for there be writers that affirm both the one and the other, Some would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Councel Table in the Senat House, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and terror of the Tuican war, faying, that one Genetal and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battel unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and mannage all at once As for himself, he had lest behind him two Roman Legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thouland in all, of horse and soot together. His opinion therefore was, that with allipeed, P. Decius the Conful, should go to his Collegue into Tufcany, and L. Volumnins have the charge of Samnium in the meantime. But in case the Consul had rather go into his own Province, then he advited, that Volumnius took his way directly, with a full and compleat Consular army, into Tuscany, to the Consul. When this discourse of the Pretor had moved a great part of the House, then P. Decim spake (by report) to this effect; That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might fland with the weal-publick) were come to Rome, or fent one of his Lieutenants by whom the Senat might be enformed, and truely understand the poyle and importance of the war in Tufcany; what forces were requifite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and needful, Fabius, fo foon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat-House, and also in the audience.

Debate between Decisa and Fabius for of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seem neither to encrease, nor H yet to diminish the rumor of the war: and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more then for his own fafety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a coadjutor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decisis the Conful of whom he had so good proof and experience in so many Magistracies, which they had born and administred together, Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having P. Decins with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if perad venture the mind and heart of his Collegue flood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volumnius to be his affiftant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samniam or Tuscany, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Confuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious ariumph, I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magiliracy, went into Tuscany, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and ptovinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have fet down. There before again, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a furcease of matter, touching the invectives of Appens before the people, against Fabius in his abfence; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to his k very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Con'uls; whiles Decius endevoured to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Confuls went out to war, and to forward.

But before that the Confuls arrived in Tuscany, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the wayes and passes all about; but inconfideratly went forward, and engaged himfell up to the top and pitch of the hill, 1. which the enemy was mafter of already, by another tide. Thus was the legion affailed on the back and beat down and thus was it enclosed and environed round by a multitude of enemies, and put to the fword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clusium. had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horiemen of the Gauls were in fight, who carrying the heads of them that were flain, some hanging before at their horsepoirtels, others this king aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed finging and chanting longs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and maffacre was not fo great: alio that when the torragers for the camp under the leading of L. Munlins Torquains a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio M the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battel was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, fo that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to war with sour legions, and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capuas chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans; there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and make head against Tuscany: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other N in the Vatican. Cn. Fulvius and L. Posthumius Megillus, both Pro-pretors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats. And there about four miles off, they lat them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much confultation, refolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazzard all their forces at once in one battel: But that the Gauls should take the Samnits unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battel was appointed. The Gauls and Samnits had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battel the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to aff ult the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusin fugitive traitors, who by night o flole away privily unto the Conful Fabius, and disclosed the invents and enterprise of the enemies: who were lent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Confuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscan country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clufium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these rodes & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the Sentipar Sentinat territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Confuls made speed to A strike a battel in their absence. And for two dayes space they skitmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field but for those two days, no worthy deed of importance was archieved. A few on both fides were flain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their stomacks whet to a full set battel then any trial or hazard made of the main chance. Hoori the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies flood ranged in battel array, there fortuned a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, and to runaway before a Wolf, even through the middt of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild bealts afunder the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans. The B Wolf had way given him through all the ranks and files; but the Hind was killed among the Gauls.

Then a Roman couldier, one of the forefront, who was to fight before the Entigns: There will the flight (quoth he) there will the flanghter be, where you see the beast sacred and dedicated to Diana iie dead: but here on this part, the martial Wolf, confecrated to Mars having with victory gone clear a way fafe and unwounded hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first founder, the fon of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnits in the left Against the Sampits, Fabrus mershalled the first and third Legions, in the right point : and Decius the fifth and fixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth served in Samnium under L. Volumnius Pro-conful. Arthe first shock and encounter, thebattel was to indifferently fought, and with to equal force, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or affailed the camp, the lofs and overthrow must needs have light in either piace. whereas they had bent their forces. Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battel went equal and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way she would on line and give the victory; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Roman under the conduct of Fabins, rather warded the enemy warily, and flood upon their guard, then offered to charge luftily : fo as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enformed and perswaded of the Samnits and Gauss both, that being as they were in the first skirmsh very hot and surious, it was soft, ient to keep off at length and at flaves end. As for the Samnits, their conrages would abate and fai, by any long conflict and the bodies of the Gauls, (who of all other can least away with travel, & heat especially) would turn all to p fweat,& meit away: who at the beginning fight more fiercely then men but in the end more faintlythen women, Against that rime therefore when the enemy used to fail & give over, Fabius had kept his fouldiers in breath & reier ed theirstrength fresh & lusty. But Decims being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the for e & vigor he had : and for that the Infantry feemed to fight but coldly, he fet the Cavalry awork: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and belought the formost gallants of those lufty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy laying that they should carry away a double honor if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horiemen to turn fide and back; but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard pell mellap mong the iquadrons of the horiemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of fight, which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons, with a great noise of their steeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them & mightily affrighted the horses of the Romans which had not been acquainted with fuch uncouth & trange noties. So the horimen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now with a foul fear discomfited and scattered, as if the hideous suries of hell, & the divel himself had been among them. Wherupon they fled hiddenly & not looking before them were overthrown both men & horfe. By this occasion the enligns of footmen were diffressed & difordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the entigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven cross through the battaillons, troden under foot and their guts squashed out. Herewithal the battailors of the Gauls footmen, seeing their enemies thus scared followed on apace & gave them no time of breathing, Decimeried out aloud to his men Whither flie ye? Or what hope have ye to fave your selves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled: Decius rallied those that were disbanded and scattered:but seeing that by no force or means he could stay them, thus amazed & astonied as they were; he called upon his father P. Decius by name, and faid; Why do I stay any longer the faral death that is destined to my house & name? It is given to our race & family, to be facrifi-"ced in lieu of propitiatory factifices for to affoil & fave the publick weal from dangers menaced " & threatned unto it. Even now therfore, wil I offer the legions of the enemies to be facilited "with my felf to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Livius the high Prieff (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged o not to depart from him) for to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to fave the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Docius at the river Veferis, in the war against the Letins, caufed himself to be offered to death : and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words: "That he drave before him. Fright Flight Murder, Masia re Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods in "Heaven & fiends in Heil: and that he would with deadly maledictions and exe rable curies imite "the enfigns, weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the fame place, should give

" both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnits together with him, plague, perdition, and destru-H " Stion. After these cursed, horrible, and detestable speeches against his own person and his enemies; look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently stain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battel was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans fo foonasthey had loft their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to finite a terror into them) flayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battel afresh. The Gan.s. and especially that troop which stood about the Cos, his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flang their darts from them (I know nothow) to no purpole, and in vain: some of them flood fill, as it were benummed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight fill, I But on the other side the high Priest Livius, with whom Decius had lest the serjeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Cof, were acquit and exculed from all other fatal danger but as for the Gauls and the Samnits, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) haled after him and calleth to follow him, the army that with him was devowed, curled, and offered: now all the enemies arefull of furies and fearful fright. Then, as these aforesaid beganthe skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Martius with a supply of inccours from the rereward; who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Conful, were sent to aid and rescue his Collegue. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all K hazards in the service of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls stood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand stroaks, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter; then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay strewed upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavoisade or tortule-fense of the enemies targets abovesaid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and stuck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battaillon (as huge and close as it was) disbanded, in such fort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, feldown assonied one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the case, and changed all in the left wing of L the Romans, But in the right, Fabius (as is beforefaid) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when ashe perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanced, had the same vigor and force, as beforeshe commanded the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnits, that upon a fignal given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could, whiles his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his subsidiary companies of the rereguard, which he had referved until that time and business, fresh and in heart: and at once, both let forward the Legions, and gave the horiemen alio a fignal to fet upon the ene- M mies. But the Samnits could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp fast by the battaillon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-fense, stood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Conful, commanded a wing or Cornet, to the number almost of 500, horiemen of Capua; to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to cast about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow; and wherefoever they espied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsmen disordered and broken, there, to second them, and press on still, and kill them whiles they were in difarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced firaight forward to the camp of the Samnits. Thither N all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crouding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gellius Egnatius, the General of the Samnits was strucken down and slain : after this, the Samnits beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their campafter small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were flain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood; for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000 and of Fabius, 1200, Fabius then having sent out to seek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Conful his body be feen, by 0 reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his fouldiers. Then Fubius fetting all other matters for the time afide, folemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his sellow Conful, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honor that could be devi-

In Tuscany also about the same time, Cn, Fulvius Propretor, had fortunat success to his hearts defire for befides great damage done to the enemy, by invafions & rodes into the country, he fought

Aalio a notable battel: wherein of Perufins and Clufins were flain above 3000, and twenty en figns won. The Samnits, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed; and of five thousand, they were lest but one thousand. Great is the same of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But fome have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330, foot, and 46000, horse strong; also, that they had a thousand charriots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuicans withal: who also (as they iay) were at the battel. And to encrease also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volumnius Propretor, was a Commander, together with the Coniuls, and that his army B was joined with the Legions of the Confuls, But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was atchieved by the two Confuls only. Volumnins in the mean time warred in Samnium; and having forced and driven the atmy of the Samnits, to take the hill Tifernum, nothing atraid for the difadvantage of the place, discomfitted them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decrus behind him in Tufcany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tu cans, and Samnits. His fouldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military rhimes and longs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decina, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the iffue and event, as well publick as privat, with the praifes of his son. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the souldiers had given unto C them * 82 Affes apeece, with a livery cloak, and coat; a good reward for a fouldiers fervice in those fine.

For all these notable victories atchieved, yet neither the Sampits nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perufins began to rebel, fo foon as the Conful had away his army: and also the Samnits came down to forrage and poil into the territory of Westin and Formianum, and another way into Eletranium, which lie along the river Vulturnus, Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his army, And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, slew four thoufand and five hundred Perulins, took prisoners 1740, who were raissomed for * 3 . D all together in the territory of * Stella. Where both the Sainhit Legions abode, and also Ap
*Toritoilo Capius and Volumnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battel fought on viona. both fides. The Romans were incented with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazzard the utmost. So there were flain of the Samnits, 16300; 2700, taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand feven hundred.

This year to fortunate in war, was by teation of peftilence much afflicted; and for certain prodigious tokens, ful of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appins Claudius, there were many infitten & blasted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were peruled and fought into. The same year Q. Fabius Garges, Ethe Consul his son, fined and punished by the sparse; certain wises who had been convicted and condemned before the people; of Adultery with which money so raised by their sines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth neer the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnies, whereof we have now continued our hiflory in these four books, for the space of fix and forty years; ever fince that M. Valerius, and Au. Cornelius were Consuls, with were the first that warred in Sammum. To let pass therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrows given and received between both nations to many years one after another, for all which calamities and loffes their hearts and courages could not be dadinted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnits, in the Sentinat country, in the Pelignsterritory, at Tifernum; and in the territory of Stella, were defeated both by themselves, with their own ogions, and also mingled with others; and that; by four armies, and four Roman Captains : loft the bravest and most noble General of all their nation; faw their confederates and allies in war; othe Tufcans; Umbrians, and Gauls, in the fame predicament as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of forraign forces ; yet for all this, would they not abitain from war, fo little weary were they of defending their liberty, although it were unfortunatly: choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irklom, and tedious, either to write or read this long fuidand train of wars, which they in figh-ting were never wearied? ting were never wearied? I mount it passions it

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Comuls L. Posthumius Megillus, and M. Artilius Re-Ggulus. Tothem both, was committed charge of Sammum, for that the bruit went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over run airesh the territory of Capaa, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Post humius by reason of sickness remained at Rome, but Attilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Sammum, before they had taken the field; for so the Senat had given direction : rand he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been so of purpose before by them determined ready there to keep him from entrance and folar off were they from wasting the lands of the Samnits, that they could not once enter into their confines; nay, the Samnits debarred them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts u and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another; that, which the Romans being fo often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how utter despair driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Sammits attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this so ventrous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether invain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy milt, which continued a good part of the day, to thick and palpable, as men could not see before them, I say not. fo far as without the trench, but not fo much as those that came close to speak one to another. The Samnits hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was full day light, and the lame much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, I who in the gates and entrance of the camp warded but negligently: being thus taken on a fudden, they had neither courage nor strength enough to relift. At the back-fide of the camp, they assaulted the great gate Decumana, seized the Questors pavilion, and that quarter about it where the Questor himself (L. Opimius Panfa) was flain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Cof. being with this tumult raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit the one of Lucanians, and the other of Sueffans, which haply were next hand, to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad fireet in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battel array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the car and onteries, rather then by the fight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what is number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and mistrusting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midft of the camp but then the Conful cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds first, and after have a new piece of work to affail and win them again? So, they let up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they fet forward, and preffed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drave them afore them; with the same fear, that they themselves began, yea, and chased them our of the gate and the trench : but to proceed further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, contenting themselves with the saving of their camp and no more: and so they retired within their ram- L parts having flain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as wel thole that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the warch, as of those that were surprised about the Questors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnits speeding so well, made them take better heart; so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, no, nor to much, as to go a forraging into their tetritory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forrage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all their occurrents more troublesome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Cos, before he was well recovered of his fickness, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclamed the Rendezvous at Sora, for his fouldiers theretold meer. Himself now dedicated unto the goddels Midria, the Temple, which in the time of his Curule Ædileship he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of perfons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Conful. But the Samnits distrusting themselves, as not able to withfland two armies, were diflodged, and departed back: and the Confuls also parted one from another, fundry ways, to wastethe country, and assault the towns. Pesthumiu athi: first coming, affayed by meer force to affail the town Milionia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached close to the wals, and wan it: and albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all streets and parts thereof, from the *fourth hour of the day until the eighth, with N doubtful and variable events for a good while; but in the end the Romans became mafters of the town, Of Samnits were flain 3200 and 4200, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other the afternoon, booty and pillage. From thence, he ledforth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the ftill night feafen, and departed in great filence at a contrary postern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Conful fo foon as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Miliona: but afterwards, perceiving all filent and defolate throughout the City, feeing neither men normunition within the towers and upon the walls: he held back his fouldiers, defirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and disfurnished of delence: and doubting to 0 fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and privy ambush, he commanded two Cornets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the counterscarp, and well to view and considerall places. The horsemen finding one or two gates need together standing wide open, and in the very same ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night; rode foftly neerer and neerer to the gates; and there they might see straight aforethem safe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Conful, that the City was abandoned, and the

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very folitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure; as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there scattered all abroad, whiles they halfned fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Conful upon this report, with his hoft drew to that fide of the town, which the horsemen were at and pitching down his ensigns not far from the gate, commanded five other horemen to enter into the City; giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them should stay behind in the same place, if they saw all safe and out of danger; and the other two, bring him word what they had feen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone to far as they might fee about them every way into all parts, & could perceive Bnothing but filence and vast desolation all about, both far and neer: then forthwith, the Conful entred the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the reft in the mean while to fortifie the camp. The fouldiers being once entred, fell to break open the doors: where they found a few filly old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conteighed and transported : those they rifled, and ransackt; and by certain captives they underflood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they should find the like emptiness and solitude. And as the priloners faid, fo it proved indeed : and the Conful possessed himself of those forlorn and aban-The other Conful M. Artilius, had so easie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was befreged by the Samnits: the enemy encountred and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battel: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and iffue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans fide: both because they were not used to be vanquished; and ano for that in the very loose and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part, Which fearful fight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them, & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow, And even then, being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguish, thinking verily that the Samnits would prefently affault their camp, or at least wile that in the morning betimes they D must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was less, so their heart and courage was never the more: For fo foon as the day brake, defirous werethey to be gone without any battel. Howbeit there was bur one way, & that lay close and near to their enemies; which they were not fo foon entred into, but they made shew a far off, as if they marched straight to the affault of the camp. The Conful commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Ailies, he gave several charges to do as he thought needful and requifite. They all promifed to execute any direction what foever; but they faid withal, that their fouldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and fit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying : and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so daunted were they, that they E would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very shame and nothing elle, they forbare indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Consul hearing this, thought good to go obout him elf in person, unto every one of his souldiers, and to speak unto them: and even as hemet with any of them, and faw them to backward, and going about fo coldly to take arms and weapon in hand; he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and afking why they fat Gill? why they loitered and made such delay? faying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to fally forth: yea, and forced they should be to fight before their tent doors, if they would not give battel without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (faith he) and will fight manfully, shall obtain undoubted victory : but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming, must either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in these tearms, they anfwered flatly again; that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done; and had neither ftrength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (lay they) feem more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached; and being now but a little way off, they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Wherupon they faid confidently, that they law the Samnits to bring with them their stakes and pales to call apallaisado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Conful cried out upon them for very shame to suffer so foul a reproach and disgrace of a most dastardly enemy." And shall " we be (quoth he) befet and empaled within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine "with thame, rather then by edge of word (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men? The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done; and do every man as he thinks best: "as for M. Artilius the Consul, he is resolved even himself alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongst the Samnits enfigns, "than see the Roman camp besieged with a trench cast, and rampart raised obout it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands and Coronets of the Cavalry. yea, and the principal Centurions of the formost companies liked well of this, and accepted the Consul his words. Then the souldiers for flark shame, full faintly take weapon in hand, and as slowly, God wor go forth of camp. vy cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a fort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better relolved and settled then they. For so soon as the samnis H discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the rereguard, there were a muttering and bruitirom one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always leared) to empeach and stop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to fly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slay their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they cast together upon an heapin the midit: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the I first shour, But neither of both had any stomack to fight, And surely on both sides they had gone fundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, left if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal shour neither flirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some sew Cornets of horsmen from a side, without the battaillons: wherof the most part fel from their horfes, and others were dilarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnits ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romans also to rescue their sellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot : but the Samnits advanced forward in greater number far, and bestirred themselves (as it feemed) more luftily : and withal, the Roman horiemen being difordered and in confusion, K with their horses affrighted trod under their feet the sootmen that came to rescue. Who beginning once to flie, caused the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnits played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Conful rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he beslowed a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposite in the way: and made proclamation, that who foever came toward the camp, were he Samnit or were he Roman, should be taken and nied as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himself against the fouldiers, that marched fo fast in heaps to the camp. Whither away sirrah, (quoth he to eve-Ty fouldier that he met) even here shalt thou find men in arms to fight withal; here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entring here into the camp without victory fo long as thy Conful liveth : chuse therefore whether thou hadst rather fight with thy L own countrimen or thine enemies. Wniles the Conful entertained them with this welcom, the horsemen also with spear in rest, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the sootmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus not only the Conful his vertue and prowess served in good flead, but fortune also went on their fide : for the Samnits followed not the chase to hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their enfigns, and to direct their battaillons from their camp against the enemy, Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions snatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their fouldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how diforder-By and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consul lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if to be the Roman M army flaged their flight, and by renuing the conflict should kill and vanquish the Samnits Legions. Hereupon endevoured they on all hands, the Captain and souldier, both horiemen and footmen, to re-enforce the battel. And even the very gods from heaven seemed to have a seecial regard of the Romans at that time, fo quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulsed from the ramparts, and within a small while forced again to the very place where the battelbegan. Whereby reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midit, and now lay in their very way, they wete flopped in their very passage, and for sear lest their goods should be rifled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compaffed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where in the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were N in number 7300. who were all put naked under the yoak, and fold: the number of them that were flain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great lift to boaft and brag of their victory, for the Conful taking view and account of his loss there two days, found by computation, that he missed 7300.

Whiles these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnits with another power, assayed to surprize and get again Interanna, a Colony of the Romans: fituate upon the Latine high-way; but when they could not be masters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory; and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattel, one with another; whiles they were drawing the fame before them, together with certain Coloners whom they had taken priloners, they light upon Conful as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only lost their spoil, but were 0 themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consul made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interanna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and there, leaving his army, went to Rome, against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor; both for that he had lost fo many thoulands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and sold them, without farther imposition.

The other Cof. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of war to work upon among the Samnits

A passed with his army into Tuscany and after he had first pilled and spoiled the Volsinians territo. ry, he gave them battel not far from their walls, who issued forth to desend their frontiers; where there were 2200. Tuscans shain: the rest, by reason that the City was so neer, escaped and saved themselves. Then led he his army into the territory of Rosellum, where he not only laid the fields waite, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand, and slew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Hetruria, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been. For three of the throngest and most prissant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tulcany, to wit, Volfinii, Perufia, and Arctium, defired accord, And having conditioned with the Conful, and promifed, to find his fouldiers clothing and corn, to they might Bhave leave to fend Orators to Rome to treat for peace, obtained at length a truce of forty years. have leave to lend Unations to automate the transport of the leafts done, the Conful And for that prefernt, each City was fined to pay * 500000 Alles. For theleafts done, the Conful *1561-1,10.87 having requested triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to feel, speed; and perceiving some of them to deny him flatly, as pretending that it was so lateere he departed the City; and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Samnium into Tuscany and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Collegue, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with him, were against his triumph : My Masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I wil not be so far mindful of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Consul: and by vertue of the fame authority of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars; for so much cas, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Samnium and Tuscany, atchieved victory, and obtained peace; triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat, After this, there arole a debate and diffention among the Tribuns of the Commons, Some of them faid, they would enterpose their negative that he should not in this manner triumph, and give so illa precedent. Others gave out, that they would affift him in his triumph, maugre the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Conful being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Confuls, also Caius Martius Rutilius of late days, even the father of him, who then was Cenfor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and faid, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the D Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vaffals and flaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crossed the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees what foever. So the morrow after, by the affiltance of three Trib. banded against the opposition and negative voices of seven, yea, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year also. Claudius writeth, That Posthumius having won certain towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in perfon being hurt, was with some few besides, driven to take Luceria for resuge: and that it was Attilius, that fought in Tuscany, and triumphed. Fabius contratily reporteth, That both Confuls E warred in Sammium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tuscany: but which of the Confuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not fet down withal : also, that before Lisceria, there were on both parts many flain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past : howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Fanum, [i. a place pronounced, destined, and confecrated betake order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be edified accordingly. After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Consul, L. Papprins Curfor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Also a mighty great war, and such a victory as never any General wan the like at the Samnits hands before that day, but L. Papprius again the Confuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and surniture of most costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they used the help and favor of the gods befides, by a strange kind of induction and institution of the fouldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial cultom, as if they were to take orders in some holy mysteries; yea, and levied musters throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edict: That wholoever of the youngerfort and serviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclemation, and wholoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accussed and damned. Which done, the Rendezvouz was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to affemble. Where there gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the midft of the camp, was a plot of ground let out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boords, and the same covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated and divine services aid, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen and the same by a certain Priest, one Ovius Paccius, a very aged man who avouched, that he fet these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnits, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they

foreto build a Temple on.] But in this year at last, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a conscience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and complotted to retty at doonspired to surprise Capua out of the Tuicans hands. When the facrifice H was done, the General of the army by his Purlevant at arms, commanded to lite and call forth by name, the nobles persons, either for parentage, or acts atchieved : who were brought into the place alorefaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this facred solemnity (which were able to thrike a religious tear and devotion in a mansmind) there were certain alters erected in the midit of this place clotely covered in all parts, and facrifices lying flain all about, and the Centurions flanding round with their fwords ready drawn. Then the fouldier was caused to approach neer the altars (ike a fir rifice himfelf, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by ve the oran oath, to promife, that he would never utter abroad and reveal. whatfoever he there should see or hear. Atterward he was put to swear, after an horrible and dreading t form of words, fr med and tending exprelly to the curring of his own perion his house and all his race and image in case, he went not into any battel, whereloever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or law any one to run away, and flew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, somethere were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were m. flacred by the Altars fide. And lying there along together with the beafts, which had their throats out for fa rifices, they ferved for a warning to teach all the reft how they made retufal. When the chief or the Samnits had taken this abominable and curfed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the loveraign Captain who every one had in charge to chuse himfelf a fellow, and they likewise succeffively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Lineata Legio [i, the innen Legion] taking K the name of the covering of that in loture, wherin the Nobility of the Samnits were (worn, I hele had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with heimets creited and plumed, because they should feem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thou and and better, who neither in goodly and tall person ge nor in martial prowers and reputation, nor yet in furniture and setting out, were inferiour to the linnen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole firength and manhood of ali Samaium, aftembled and encamped in Aquilon a. The Roman Confuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Carvilius first; unto whom were appointed the o d Legions, which M. Attilue the Conful of the former year, had left in the territory of Interamna. And with them he mar hed into Samnium. And mean while t that the enemies were over much buffed and amufed about their superfictious ceremonies, and held their secret and mylical oun els, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Amiternum, Where almost 2800, men were flain, and 4270, taken prisoners. But Papprins, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, for ed the town Duronia; took fewer prisoners then his Collegue but in lieu thereof, put many more to the fword. A rich booty there was got both in the one place and the other. Atterwards the Confuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they poiled and wasted especially the lands about Atinium. Carvilius marched as faras Cominium, and Paprius to Aquilonia, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped, There, for a good while they neither fat still, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot fervice in the field. They tpent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly y would have fitten flitt; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that assaled them: and thus, i fay, with threatning rather then offering battel they passed the day. For whiles they beganever and anon and gare over as quickly, there was no iffue feen of any skirmifnes, & the decifion even of small matters and occurrents were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off and albeit the other Conful was absent, yet his hand and counfel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilonia, then at Comissium: fo Carvilius had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself befieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Collegue, to fignifie unto him; that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy barrel: and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewife should with all his forces affinit Cominium; that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leifure to lend any furcour to Aquilonia. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his meffage and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Conful from his Collegue, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papyrius then immediatly dimitted and fent aw y the contrier aforefaid, and aftembled his fouldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large conserning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the prefent preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and offentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crefts " (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to " pierce their gui ded and dama ked fhields: yea, and that other glittering army with milk white o " dispersoats must be died red in blood, when they come to firoaks, and to try it out by dint " of tword. The golden and filvered armies of the Samuits, were fometimes by my father put "to the (word, and killed to the laff man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and lave themselves. This is a fatal gift, " and deltined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the "greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

"no doubt are present to defend and assist us in our quarrel, against those that so oft have sought for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And if a man may conjecture "and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adverse "and all of indignity, then to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts "and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind of sacrifice; and de-"yowed to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one tide, the rengeance "of the same gods, witnesses off their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other "fide the deteltable and abominable curies, comprised in an oath, taken against all covenant and "promife; hath fworn by constraint and perforce; hatethand detesteth the oath whereby they B"are perjured, and at one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own felves, and their enemies. Thus having shewed unto his fouldiers (who were already of themselvs badly and malitiously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the conflant relation averred by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of affured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for battel: and nothing grieved them more then this, That it was put off until the morrow; hating in their hearts the relt of that day behind, and that one night, for being so long. About mid-night, Papritus having received letters back from his Collegue, gat him up closely when all were fast afleep, and sent the chick-matter to take token, & observe the presage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree foever but had a defire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the souldiers affection and courage that way, and the fouldier likewife the Captains; in so much that the same ardent denre of battel which was in all the reft, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Autorces. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-mafter adventured to lye and failitie the token, and made report to the Conful, that it was * Tripudium falifimum. Whereat * Thechiethe Conful right glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was Mucky, and that they were to kens fell to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods: and hereupon he put forth the fignal or bloody their meas for banner of battel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, behold a fugitive with their haout of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and those fly feeding, were about 400, in a cohort, were gone to Cominium. And because his Collegue Carvilius should some coin iell not be ignorant hereof, he presently dispatched a currier in post unto him, and himself commanto the ground, ded the Enfigns and Standards to be advanced and fet forward with speed, ordaining the bands and schools. in the rereward for succours, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, ded again; and accordingly. He appointed L. Volumnius to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the this was Tripaaccordingly. He appointed D., comming to teach the light thing, and the probability, and the filling fellifi-horfemen he committed to the condited of two other Lieutenants, C. Cedatius, and Trebonius, mins, and in As for Sp. Namius, hecharged him in all haste to take off the pack-faddles from the Mules, and their learning to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and was reputed with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon an hill there in fight, and in the heat of the con- the best Auwith them to fetch a compass, and to letze upon an initiation in the could. Whiles spicial in that flict, to shew himself from thence, and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly the could. Whiles spicial in that she had a spice of the sheet of t the General was occupied hereabont, there arole fome warbling amongst the chicken-masters faged mest touching the Auspice or presage of that day; inso much as they were over heard of the Roman happy succ. is horiemen; who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised S_p , P_{a-} pyrius (the Confuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was fome doubt and question about the Auspice. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheists, nor Lectures read of despining God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certifie any thing wherof he was not lure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledg thereof to the Consul: who faid thus unto him, "God bless theemy son, and be not thou dismayed therat, "but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and "overlight of the Birds and Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary "prelage, or false sign, all the mischief and peril light upon his own head for his lewd lyc. As for me I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell heartily to their meat and I hold it for a lucky "Auspice and token of good success unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This faid, he commanded the Centurions to fet those pulletors, in the forefront of the battel. The Samnits also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battaillons follow after gallantly set out in gorgeous armor and brave apparrel, in such fort, as the very sight of the enemies represented a magnificent and flately show to the beholders. But see what happed; before the first shour given, before the first volly of shot and encounter, the principal Pulletier chanced to be stricken with a javelin, lanced at aventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Enfigns, Which being reported unto the Conful, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are present "in this battel, the guilty person hath his due reward. And as the Consul was a speaking these words, lo, suft before him a Raven set out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud note: at which Augury, the Cof, rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to found, and to let up a lufty shout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both fides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were ravished and carried on end to the battel, with anger, hope and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their fwords, and embruing their hands in the enemies bloodshed. But the Samnits many of them by force of necessity, and constraint of a blind and superstitious religion, even against their wills, were forced to make resistance, and desend themselves rather then to fight
